Subject: Ruto and the "No" team concede defeat in Kenya's Constitutional Referendum

Colleagues,

Shortly before 2 PM Nairobi time, William Ruto and the "No" team conceded defeat. Saying that "Kenyans have spoken" and that the constitution has been accepted at the referendum, Ruto said that he will now focus on fixing the contentious issues outlined by the "No" team by participating in the implementation process. Somewhat disingenuously, Ruto is also saying that a "majority of Kenyans either did not vote or voted against the new constitution." He has urged his supporters to remain peaceful and accept the outcome.

At about 1 PM, church leaders held a press conference acknowledging the draft has passed, and stating that the church will work to address the new constitution's "moral issues of concern."

On a personal note, I will be departing post tomorrow morning and will leave the office in a few hours. It has been an honor and privilege to work with a wonderful team in support of Kenya's constitutional reform, and I am thankful to have witnessed such a peaceful and positive outcome. I wish my colleagues the best as they turn now to the task of supporting the implementation. Glenn Warren (WarrenGS@state.gov / +254-717-727-842) is the primary point of contact for constitutional issues going forward.

Best regards,

Latest from Nairobi. Glenn is political counselor there.

1. This situation report is current as of 6:30 pm. It concludes Embassy Nairobi's Referendum situation reports.

2. Results from approximately 200 of 210 constituencies have been counted and final results should be announced within the next hour. The "Yes" vote is about 5.5 million and the "No" vote is about 2.5 million. Final results should show "Yes" with about 69 percent.

3. President Kibaki, Prime Minister Odinga, and Vice President Musyoka addressed a large crowd at the Kenya International Conference Center at about 6:00 pm. Avoiding triumphalism , they struck themes of unity, reconciliation, renewal, and building a new Kenya. After Odinga called for unity and paid tribute to Kibaki's leadership, Kibaki noted that Kenya was coming to the end of an historic 20-year journey. The adoption of a new constitution was a victory for those who had fought long and hard for a new constitutional dispensation that would usher in a new Kenyan nation. He congratulated Kenyans on a successful and peaceful resolution of the constitutional process that showed that Kenya's democratic institutions had come of age. Kibaki said he was particularly pleased with the transparent and efficient conduct of the Interim Independent Electoral Commission. He called on all elements of Kenyan society to implement the constitution. Referring to opposition to the constitution, Kibaki said their voices would be heard. Democracy was about accepting the verdict of the majority, he said, while acknowledging space for the minority.

4. Earlier in the day, opposition leader William Ruto conceded defeat. He thanked the Kenyan people for their peaceful participation in the process and specifically thanked the more than two million people who had resisted blackmail and manipulation to vote "no." He argued that the majority of Kenyans had either voted against the constitution or did not vote. Therefore, the "yes" side would have to consult with the opposition on issues of concern to it.

5. Embassy observer teams have returned from the field and reported that the situation throughout Kenya, including the Rift Valley, is calm. Tensions have eased in the Rift Valley following Ruto's concession, and Post expects the post-Referendum period to be peaceful.

2.Thank-you Letter from Cameroon Delegate to Embassy

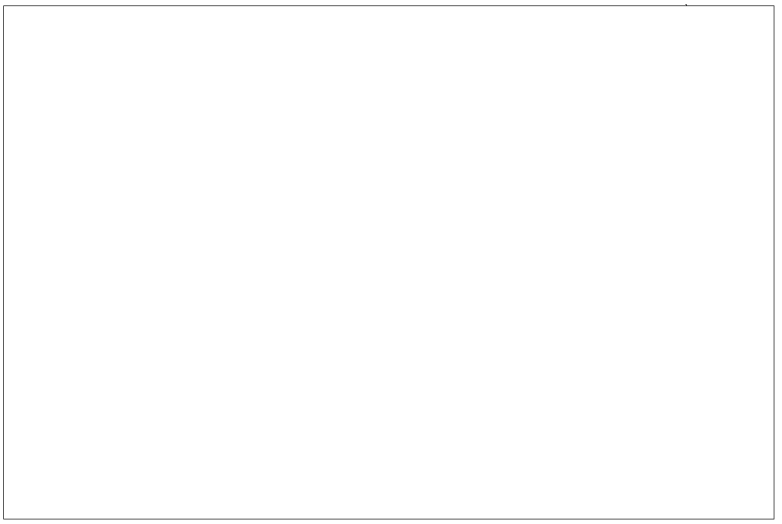
Dear All,

Good morning from Washington DC. I trust that we are keeping well. I just want to use this opportunity to say that today we come to the end of the program here on the President's Forum. All along this Forum and especially during the White House meeting with President Obama, I have been asking myself what it means to be here in DC and to be representing Cameroon at this forum?

I have recently come to the realization that the time is critical and that President Obama in his thinking about a new Africa believes that young people whom we are, diverse and intelligently different can take little positive actions to ensure that the next 50 years witnesses significant changes in our social processes, our political institutions, processes and structures, our economic freedom, taking into consideration our cultural specificities.



While traveling to America, I kept imagining the moment when President Obama would tell us great and magical ways to getting out of our current socio-economic and especially political hostage situations, but in all and after all the speeches, conversations and interactions with Ordinary Americans like in the Southside of Washington DC, State Department Staff, Senators, Secretary of State Clinton and President Obama, I noticed that America can only partner with us when we decide to start thinking and acting differently in our quest for a better Cameroon and a better Africa.

This thinking differently is exemplified by the American Peace Corps, in the service leadership, the spirit of give back to the nation and community and the transformation of challenges to opportunities in America and in many nations around the world...

When our troubles and challenges seems gruesome and our vision blurred by the thought and fear of the unknown if we dared, the one thing I come out with from this Forum is this, "That we just have to Think, Speak out and above all, DARE take some innovative ACTIONs to Be the change we want to see in our communities, nations and continent and commit others to same by our examples...That we have to build strong networks and undertake advocacies as a group as nothing has ever stopped a committed group of people to drive change aound the world.

The work to be done is enormous and challenging but sure the reward of every success like coming to America, to the White House and meeting with President Obama is sweet. Therefore I come back to work to be the change I want to see in Cameroon.

I thank you all for the opportunity.

I just wanted to make sure you know that the CARE speech is now going to focus on nutrition/health/early childhood, rather than being a major health speech. I still feel that you need to do a health speech as a bookend to food and water – perhaps before UNGA. You could focus on health in the context of the larger Millennium Dev Goals. You have not given a speech yet about maternal and child health. We have a great story to tell with our investment in GHI, and there will be an opportunity to tell it with the ramp-up to UNGA (with the Summit focusing on MDGs). There is a tremendous amount of activity going on elsewhere in the world. And this is a legacy issue for you. (I have already relayed this idea to CDM and Jake).

Re: Sunday, State of Play

Clegg is still in talks with Cameron. About 1,500 Liberal Democrats spontaneously protested at Lib-Dem headquarters against a deal with the Tories given their policies, especially on Europe. But Clegg remains in negotiations. He seems quite intent on working it out with Cameron, it appears. His inner Tory magnetically draws him to his heritage. Clegg has also misplayed almost every turn, presented with big chances and blowing them through a combination of inexperience (derived partly from heading a party out of power for nearly 100 years) and inbred arrogance (from no less a privileged background than Cameron, though seeming less snobbish because he went to Westminster instead of Eton and has a less pronounced upper-class accent, more neutral, because of his more cosmopolitan roots through his family).

What about Labour? Shaun and a couple of others have rounded up about 29 votes from other parties (Scottish National Party, NI parties, Welsh party) that could be part of a grand progressive once-in-a-lifetime coalition that required the LDs. Gordon has said he will allow Clegg-Cameron discussions to play out and a general offer to Clegg is on the table, its terms giving far more on a referendum and policy than the Tories. Behind the scenes, Labour is putting whatever harsh pressure it can on LD leaders. Peter is playing a cynical double game. He is a sectarian in a sect of one. Yet Gordon for strange psychological reasons rooted in his triangle with Tony and Peter relies on Peter. Peter, according to Shaun, has wrung a pledge from Borwn that if Brown emerges from this crisis he, Peter, will replace David as Foreign Secretary. Meanwhile, Peter has advised David to sideline himself. David has done so instead of being forward as a strong party man behind Brown in dire straits. Standing back only makes David look ambitious, waiting for Brown to lose and aiming to a leadership contest afterward, when Peter, as he has promised, would guide David to the prize. The plot thickens: Ed Miliband, David's younger brother, the environment secretary, will run for leader against his brother if Brown loses. Ed has more of a common touch. The outcome of that contest would be more than uncertain. But before that eventuality Gordon's team reaches out to the LDs in private. Yet Shaun's attitude, as I read it, leans toward pessmism. A London Times polls just out says 62 percent want Gordon out. Where were the fickle voters in the election? The poll shows more than discontent with Gordon, but also how people are being whipped by the Murdoch media.

What about the Tories? A secret memo from William Hague to Cameron written before the election was leaked this morning to The Observer (the Sunday paper of The Guardian), proposes an anti-Europe line of the new government. (I've enclosed the article below.) The atmosphere inside the Conservatives is acrid and anxious. But Lord Ashcroft, the Tory moneyman, who spent five million pounds alone in marginal districts, is furious that Cameron failed to win outright, failed in his campaign, made a foolish decision to include Clegg in the debates, etc. Many agree with the evil Ashcroft. But the finger pointing won't matter if a deal works with Clegg. The Conservative strategy would be to coopt Clegg now, do whatever deal can be done, maintain a more or less center-right but moderated government for about a year, call a new election, win outright on the momentum of the recovery engineered by Brown but claimed by Tories as proof that the change was responsible, jettison Clegg and the LDs, and govern from the radical right as the children of Thatcher for five years. The Tories would then move on their electoral reforms: cutting the number of seats in Parliament, redistricting in Conservative favor, and trying to outlaw union contributions to the Labour Party.

What about the LDs? Clegg's deal with the Tories would of course thwart any Lib-Lab coalition, probably the only chance for a grand progressive alliance that would keep the Tories out of power forever. Clegg's personal instincts obviously lean toward the Tories, having little to do with policy. The party's leaders may be opposed, but they are also likely to be feckless and weak as they always have been.

So, whatever the case, I would doubt you'll see David again as Foreign Secretary. Prepare for hauge, who is deeply anti-European and will be disingenuous with you. Tory budget cuts in NI, already announced, would cause havoc with peace and economic recovery. I'd send a private message asap on that score the second a new government is announced, if it is. Tilt publicly to Merkel on Europe for this reason among others.

Tory-Lib Dem coalition threatened by secret hardline memo on Europe • Draft letter by William Hague sets out tough stance on EU • Leak follows leaders' 'constructive, amicable' meeting Toby Helm
<http://www.guardian.co.uk/profile/tobyhelm> and Anushka Asthana
<http://www.guardian.co.uk/profile/anushkaasthana>

* The Observer <http://observer.guardian.co.uk> , Sunday 9 May 2010

David Cameron <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/davidcameron> 's hopes of forming a coalition with the Liberal Democrats <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/liberaldemocrats> were dramatically undermined last night by the leaking of a top-secret letter outlining the hardline Eurosceptic stance he and William Hague <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/williamhague> planned to adopt in government.
The document, obtained by the Observer, is headed "draft letter from Foreign Secretary to Prime Minister" and was written last week. It assumed an outright Tory victory and spelt out how Hague intended to adopt a tough approach to Europe at a meeting of EU foreign ministers in Brussels tomorrow.

In the letter, compiled by civil servants but written in the first person, Hague tells Cameron how his message would be that "the British relationship with the EU has changed with our election" to one firmly against any further integration. Exposing the massive gulf between Liberal Democrat leader Nick Clegg <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/nickclegg> and the Conservative leadership on Europe, Hague says he would demand the right to repatriate powers over criminal justice as well as social and employment policy during the first term of a Tory government – demands many EU leaders say they would resist.

Hague planned to tell his EU counterparts: "Rest assured that we seek engagement, not confrontation. But our aim is to achieve these commitments during this parliament." He would also tell his first foreign ministers' meeting "we will never join the euro" and conclude: "You will find us firm but fair, playing a leading role, fighting our corner, practical and straight-talking."

Last night the Tories said they had no knowledge of the letter. But the Observer understands it was drawn up on the basis of detailed briefings between senior civil servants and Hague. The document came to light as Clegg, a strong pro-European, yesterday met his MPs and senior party figures to discuss a possible coalition with the Tories, who emerged from Thursday's general election with the largest number of seats but short of an overall majority.

Cameron and Clegg held face-to-face talks late yesterday as they continued their attempts to thrash out a power-sharing deal. A senior Conservative party spokeswoman said the talks were "constructive and amicable". The 70-minute meeting took place at Admiralty House in Whitehall. A Lib Dem spokesman also described the discussions as "constructive and amicable".

Tory and Lib Dem sources said last night that discussions would not conclude until the beginning of the coming week at the earliest. An emergency meeting of the 1922 committee of Tory backbenchers will be held tomorrow to discuss the possible coalition. Today, Hague, Oliver Letwin <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/oliverletwin> and George Osborne <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/georgeosborne> will resume talks with the Lib Dems' Vince Cable, Chris Huhne and David Laws.

But the stark language used in the letter is bound to alarm Clegg, who has been savage in his criticism of the Conservatives <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/conservatives> ' attitude to Europe which he believes is rooted in the past and will limit Britain's ability to fight cross-border crime and meet the environmental challenges of the 21st century.

The document will also be seen by Lib Dem MPs and the party's rank and file as evidence that their pro-Europeanism would be compromised by linking up with the Tories. A Lib Dem spokesman said the party was strongly pro-European, but would not be drawn on the document.

Yesterday Cameron came under pressure from senior figures in his own party not to give in to Clegg's demands by watering down Conservative manifesto commitments. Shadow defence secretary Liam Fox warned that a Tory government could not be "held to ransom" by Lib Dems demanding proportional representation.

Clegg may also face opposition from within his party to any attempt to form a coalition with the Tories, particularly on economic issues.

Yesterday the Social Liberal Forum, which represents left-leaning Lib Dems and includes a third of the party's MPs, issued a set of "red lines" which it said the party must not cross, including any measure that would increase the gap between the rich and poor – ruling out supporting the Tory pledge to cut inheritance tax. Three other red lines were any suggestion of cuts to frontline services in the current financial year, any worsening treatment of asylum seekers and any watering-down of the human rights act.

Meanwhile, Gordon Brown and his closest advisers were working on how to expand their counter-offer to the Lib Dems, including a referendum on changes to the voting system. Senior officials said Labour was planning to draw up a formal "coalition contract" – as happens in Germany – that would bind the Lib Dems and other smaller parties into a deal if the Tory discussions with the Lib Dems were to fail.

Most Labour ministers now believe Brown would have to step down before Clegg would consider a pact, though senior government insiders insisted this was not being discussed as an option.

One re-elected Labour MP, John Mann, of Bassetlaw, called on Brown to step down as Labour leader, claiming that the party would have influence on the outcome of the current negotiations only if Brown agreed to give up the leadership. "Brown should not lead Labour into any future election and he should stand down before the next Labour party conference," he said. "Gordon Brown's continuation as leader rules out the credibility of a Lib-Lab pact that has to prioritise the modernisation and reform of the antiquated UK political systems."

From Foster Care To Law School Graduate, Howard University Student Beats The Odds

Jelani Freeman lived in 6 foster homes in 10 years

WASHINGTON - Jelani Freeman has gone through a lot to wear this robe. This weekend, he will graduate from Howard University Law School.

He remembers the shaky foundation of his young life. A mother who could not take care of him. He lived in six foster homes in ten years.

"Moving to these different homes. The kids were like 'you weren't here yesterday.' Where's your mom at?" said Freeman.

At 18 years old, he left the system and went to college in search of room and board. He knew what people expected of kids in the foster care system - not much.

"All I would hear is that they were in jail or homeless or weren't doing too well," said Freeman.

He beat the odds and graduated, but he felt ... alone.

"I can distinctly remember walking across the stage in undergrad. You know at graduation everyone has their cheer section that yells as you walk across the stage and there was almost silence as I walked across," said Freeman.

It will be different this time. When Freeman gets his diploma Saturday at the convention center, there will be 26 people - friends and supporters from as far away as California - in D.C. to show their support.

Freeman also got a boost from an internship program for kids who have spent time in foster care. He was placed in the office of then Senator Hillary Clinton. Clinton even mentions him in the updated version of her book "It Takes A Village."

Now, he may use his law degree to work on public policy - especially children's issues. He wants all kids to know: "There's a bright future out there for you if you stay focused and work hard."

And to the adults who hear his story, Freeman said help a child. He is living proof of the difference it can make.

Gordon was convinced he had to sacrifice himself for any attempt to form a grand progressive coalition with the Lib-Dems. Clegg had said during the campaign he would not deal with Gordon and he remained adamant. Peter, Alastair, Ed Balls, and Ed Miliband met secretly with the LD team on Sunday. Gordon decided to fall on his sword today. The negotiations between Labour and the LDs now are engaged with the same teams. The Tories at the same time also are negotiating. Both offer competing plans for electoral reform that would give the LDs more representation in the future. If the LDs strike a deal with the Tories Labour is unlikely to support it and campaign against that referendum. Cameron is strained right now. His right does not approve of a deal while others push him to make an arrangement in order to attain power. Cameron may be limited in how far he can go in his offer. But by no means is a Labour-LD deal certain or even probable, even given Gordon's political suicide. The campaign for leader to replace Gordon begins as soon as the Labour-LD negotiations are concluded. David is ready to go; he will face Ed Balls and possibly his brother Ed. If there is a coalition that would tilt against Balls, who is seen as Gordon's heir and as an inappropriate PM, Gordon redux, to work with the LDs. One of the Milibands will emerge. I still bet on David. So four days after the election, everything is still in play. Sid

On eve of Mother's Day, Clinton pushes for paid leave for new parents From CNN Senior State Department Producer Elise Labott WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Secretary of State Hillary Clinton pledged to push Congress to get paid leave for federal employees who are parents of newborn or newly adopted children on Friday, in a videotaped Mother's Day message to State Department employees."I know how challenging it can be to balance the demands of work and family," Clinton said. "Whether you're welcoming a new baby, juggling soccer practice and piano lessons, or even helping plan your daughter's wedding --parenting can be more than a full-time job."Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, is getting married this summer. Currently, federal employees do not get paid maternity or paternity leave. Clinton said she would work with Congress to take "overdue" steps to provide State Department families with the paid time off they need to recuperate from childbirth, care for the mother, care for a newborn with a serious ailment or disability, or complete an adoption."We can and should do more to provide public servants with the same maternity and paternity leave benefits that many private sector employers already offer," Clinton said. "They're standard for many other governments around the world. It's not enough to just talk about the importance of family-- our policies must reflect our commitment and our values."Clinton has been at the forefront of the Obama administration in pushing for better benefits for federal employees. She was the administration's first cabinet secretary to ask for benefits for same-sex partners of federal employees, requesting the extension for Foreign Service employees. President Obama has since extended some benefits to same-sex partners of employees throughout the federal government.

As you may be aware, earlier this year, OIG issued a very negative report on our Public Diplomacy operations throughout Africa. I have attached a copy of the action plan which Johnnie and his team developed to address the issues raised in the report. The plan is a very deliberate effort to address the shortcomings identified by the OIG, do a better job of integrating public diplomacy and public affairs into the whole AF Bureau, and deliver better PD and PA work.

I think it is an excellent report and provides a good model for the bureaus as we endeavor to create a new direction for Public Diplomacy.

Executive Summary

To address concerns raised by the OIG in its August 2009 inspection report of the Africa Bureau, the Office of Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs (AF/PDPA) has engaged in an organizational development process. Over the past few months AF/PDPA has defined the philosophy, role, mission, audiences, core functions, and value added of public diplomacy and public affairs in the Africa Bureau and set goals and strategies for the AF/PDPA office to excel.

The Department of State's expertise on public diplomacy programs and activities in Africa, on the regional African public and media context, and on the Department's engagement with the media and American audiences on African issues should reside in AF/PDPA.

The mission of Africa Bureau (AF) public diplomacy and public affairs is to support the achievement of U.S. foreign policy goals and objectives, advance national interests, and enhance national security by understanding, engaging, informing and influencing the people of Africa and informing the people of the United States of America in order to create an enabling environment and strong relationships for a healthy, mutually-beneficial U.S.-African partnership.

This four-year organizational development plan lays down specific goals, strategies and actions/changes that will facilitate the highest level of performance of the office's core functions, address the office's performance challenges, and take advantage of opportunities. Throughout this plan is an ongoing commitment by AF/PDPA personnel to a renewed approach to their work. The commitment is to increased initiative, more strategic thinking, more frequent and earlier engagement in policy-making processes, and a fuller understanding by every staff member of how his/her work contributes to the larger whole. Over the course of the next few months, the approach of each AF/PDPA staff member will change as will a number of roles and portfolios. This plan assumes that the rest of the AF Bureau not only will be receptive to these changes but also will pro-actively seek AF/PDPA expertise and collaboration as appropriate.

The most visible outcome of this organizational development process will be the physical reorganization in the Africa Bureau. As soon as space is available, AF/PDPA will embed public diplomacy desk officers in the AF geographic offices. In order to make space available and to increase coordination among the bureau's functional offices, all of which do some engaging of civil society and private-sector audiences in the United States and in Africa, Assistant Secretary Carson has asked the bureau's executive office to conduct a full-bureau analysis of office space based on function, size and resource available. This analysis will inform the ultimate decisions as to who sits where.

However, the most significant outcome of this process will not be the shuffling of office space, but the results. The current AF/PDPA team is constantly short-staffed but at its core is an innovative, talented team of Civil and Foreign Service experts in engaging publics and the media and building long-term relationships for the United States. With added expertise, further integration with the rest of the Bureau and a 21st century focus on networking, AF/PDPA will produce results: more effective public diplomacy in > "The U.S. must recognize the necessity of orchestrating networks of public, private and civic actors to address global problems"

> -- Anne-Marie Slaughter

Africa and public affairs in the United States and better informed policy-making in Washington.

AF/PDPA is adopting five major goals and will use seven cross-cutting strategies to achieve the goals by taking dozens of specific steps and actions.

AF/PDPA Goals

By 2014:

I. AF/PDPA is valued for public diplomacy leadership in Africa and for public affairs leadership on Africa policy in the U.S.

II. Policy-making on Africa is informed by an understanding of public perspectives. State depends on AF/PDPA for expertise and advice on understanding, informing, engaging, and persuading publics in Africa and informing the U.S. public.

III. The conduct of public diplomacy in Africa and AF's public affairs in the U.S. is strengthened and enhanced via the achievement of specific, measurable public diplomacy and public affairs program objectives.

IV. AF attracts and retains a diverse, high-caliber public diplomacy and public affairs workforce.

V. Resources to engage publics in Africa and in America are sufficient and deployed in line with policy priorities.

Strategies

A. Address location and restructure to close access and communications gaps with AF, better support and guide the field, facilitate AF engagement with target domestic audiences, support expanding PD portfolios, make positions more desirable, and facilitate AF inter-office teamwork.

B. Engage fully in AF policy-making processes, especially the paper process.

C. Raise visibility of PD and PA work in AF.

D. Build and retain expertise in the field and in AF/PDPA.

E. Increase AF/PDPA networking and coalition building.

F. Empower the field and AF/PDPA

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770301 Date: 08/31/2015

G. Align resources with policy priorities and stretch resources via partnerships with other USG, private, and non-profit organizations to maximize resource coordination on shared policy and program goals.

Actions to Achieve Both Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs Goals

1. Engage more in the formal paper process (report more to the Front Office via DARs, Info Memos etc.)
2. Increase administrative support to public affairs staff and cultural coordinator
3. Retain special projects/assistant cultural affairs position
4. AF Bureau BSRP includes public diplomacy and public affairs goal paper
5. Increase coordination and clarify PDPA roles to AF functional offices
6. Establish all-AF/PDPA electronic filing and contact systems
7. Reconfigure media officer position to non-traditional media and outreach position
8. New deputy PACO/special projects civil service position
9. Pilot if appropriate: "Public Environment" issue paper for A/S and higher trips

Public Diplomacy Actions

1. PD desk officers develop PD, educational, cultural, media, and social networking expertise in portfolio countries
2. Embed desk officer positions in geographic offices
3. Improve support for first-time PAOs
4. Meet Specific Public Diplomacy Program Objectives (Listed on page 25 and in Annex V)
5. Streamline and improve results/impact and public environment reporting from the field (Embrace MAT)
6. Annual AF PAO Conference in Washington, DC.
7. MSRPs – PD included in all goal papers and specific PD goal paper
8. Increase interagency coordination with an emphasis on Africom and USAID
9. AF/PDPA makes better use of public opinion polling/academic analysis and data on Africa
10. Annual Franklin and/or Science & Technology Fellow in AF/PDPA
11. Improve links to public-private partnerships
12. Chief of Mission EERs include public affairs achievements

Public Affairs Actions

1. Increase strategic value of outreach to the Africa Bureau
2. Enhance Diaspora Relations Coordination
3. Restructure morning media clips
4. Biweekly calendar of domestic outreach and media interviews
5. PD-DAS takes on principal AF Bureau spokesperson role
6. Internal marketing - update AF/PDPA information on State's internal websites

I. ABOUT THE ORGANIZATIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROCESS

Since mid-January, the Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs Office of the Africa Bureau (AF/PDPA) has been engaged in a practical, structured organizational development process that seeks:

- To enhance the effectiveness of public diplomacy in Africa and the Africa Bureau's public affairs in the United States;
- To improve AF/PDPA's ability to meet its mandates and fulfill its mission, and
- To directly address concerns raised by the OIG in its August 2009 inspection report of the Africa Bureau - ISP-I-09-63 – about the need "to better integrate AF/PDPA into the Africa Bureau" and to "address the philosophy and role of public diplomacy and public affairs in forming and contributing to the policy of the Africa Bureau in the medium and longer term."

This process is not a performance evaluation for any person, an inspection, or a judgment on the relative value of any position. Through interviews, document reviews, and group discussions the contractor led a volunteer organizational development team of PDPA staff and leadership in analyzing office performance challenges, opportunities, strengths and weaknesses[1], in clarifying what the public diplomacy and public affairs functions are needed to do in the Africa Bureau (AF) – their philosophy, role, mission and value added - and in setting goals and strategies for AF/PDPA to excel.

During this process AF/PDPA often took a zero-based approach to consideration of its own existence, organization, location, and function. Over the first four months of this year the majority of the staff in AF/PDPA continuously pressed themselves to define not only what they do, but also the value of the tasks and activities they perform. Questions and options for discussion during weekly brown bag sessions, meetings of senior leadership, as well as at a half-day all-office meeting, challenged traditions and assumptions and defined primary audiences.

For example, from "what if" type questioning as to whether a public diplomacy (PD) office is needed at all in a regional bureau came clarity about the role of AF/PDPA and its core functions. The analysis of over a half dozen configurations for the public diplomacy country affairs officer (PD desk) position, including eliminating it entirely, became the decision not only to keep the geographic portfolios but to proceed as quickly as possible to embed the PD desks into their corresponding geographic offices. This analysis has concluded that State Department public engagement on Africa policy is best coordinated and led by an active joint public diplomacy and public affairs office in the Africa Bureau - AF/PDPA.

[1] The "Where You Are" interim report was produced by the contractor in March 2010 with the input of AF/PDPA staff.

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770301 Date: 08/31/2015

This process has followed the PD-version of the medical code "primum non nocere" – first, do no harm to the field. However, just as in medicine this does not mean the changes to which AF/PDPA is committing itself and those it is expecting from the AF Bureau, R, posts, and other stakeholders will be easy or painless.

Additional information on the methodology of the process is found in Annex II.

II 21ST CENTURY AFRICA PUBLIC DIPLOMACY & PUBLIC AFFAIRS – CONTEXT AND MANDATES

> "I do not see the countries and peoples of Africa as a world apart; I see Africa as a fundamental part of our interconnected world -- as partners with America on behalf of the future we want for all of our children. That partnership must be grounded in mutual responsibility and mutual respect."
> -- President Barack Obama

The African public comprises eight hundred million people who speak thousands of languages in forty-seven countries spread across an area larger than China, the United States and Western Europe combined. Most Africans have no direct contact with America or Americans.

Africa has the world's fastest population growth rate. Forty-four percent of the population is under 15 and African youth are hungry for opportunity, education, and relevance. Education is a top priority for families across the continent. Traditional American educational and cultural diplomacy – academic exchanges, English teaching, student advising, libraries, and performing arts – provide what people want and, as such, an important opportunity for U.S. Missions to reinforce priority messages and themes. They also provide a two-way window that gives Africans a view of a more diverse, complex, value-based America than is available on most flat screens, and US officials, access to, and greater understanding of, local societies and emerging leaders in particular.

With estimates of no more than a fifth to a third of Africa's population having electricity at home and historically centralized and inadequate national telecommunications infrastructure, the web-based information revolution of the last twenty years largely bypassed Africa. Africa is well on its way to leapfrogging right over it. Cell phone and other mobile handheld technologies are connecting, informing and empowering urban and rural dwellers like never before.

The U.S. is generally well-regarded in Africa. The U.S.-Global Leadership Project found in 2009 that 83% of sub-Saharan Africans approved of U.S. leadership. BBC World Service polling found that 85% of Kenyans and 72% of Nigerians view U.S. influence as mainly positive. Americans' interest in Africa is growing. For example, IIE's Open Doors report on international educational exchange indicates that although still small, the percentage of American students studying in Africa has increased steadily for the past fifteen years. The bonds that have joined America's and Africa's history have created durable, complicated ties, strong opinions, and sometimes unrealistic public expectations. This history, these trends, and the personal popularity of President Obama create tremendous opportunity for public diplomacy in Africa.

As African nations become stronger international players, as global networks – reputable and nefarious – increasingly include Africans, as African diasporas are involved more regularly back home, the number of priority themes and issues on which to engage a greater number of audiences grows every year. The Africa Bureau places a priority on expanding public programming outside of chancery compounds to reach more youth, women, and Muslim communities as well as African diaspora and users of social media. Yet, Department of State public engagement resources on and in Africa have been in short supply for years.

The Department of State's public diplomacy and public affairs Africa resources (human and programmatic) are currently dwarfed by those in budgets in other U.S. government agencies marked for specific angles of this purpose. For example, in Africa it is not unusual for a Department of Defense (DoD) Military Information Support Team (MIST) to have three times the number of American officers and budget of the Embassy's Public Affairs section. Peace Corps can deliver a dozen American volunteer English teachers directly to rural schools in a single country while State may be able to fund only one English teaching fellow to work on Mission-theme-based curriculum development (i.e. English language instruction that uses good governance, accountability, tolerance, respect for diversity and other themes.) USAID is able to invest millions of dollars in media training via non-profit organizations while a single $100,000 journalism grant is a major program for most public affairs sections in Africa.

Private charitable foundations, American businesses and non-profits also invest more on communications, education and media in Africa than does the Department of State. Carnegie and other foundations are investing tens of millions of dollars annually in specific African universities over the course of a decade while the Fulbright program provides at most a few scholars per year to these institutions. American civil society groups spend more than AF's annual domestic public affairs budget on informing and engaging the American people on a single issue - Darfur.

> "Africa is cutting-edge cool at this point"
> -- Mark Anthony Neal, professor of black culture at Duke University (May 2010)

The resource imbalance is a reality, but in the 21st century it need not be the only factor that defines effectiveness or even relative impact. As Anne-Marie Slaughter has noted "networked power flows from the ability to make the maximum number of valuable connections…In a networked world, the issue is no longer relative power but centrality in an increasingly dense global web."[2]

In Africa, where experience has taught citizens not to expect that centralized government will do what is best for society when it means going against the personal interests of those in power, smaller identity networks (ethnic, religious, school, clan etc.) are critically important. Adapting to a networked style will make U.S. government public affairs more effective in Africa. Indeed, for years the GAO has recommended "campaign style" approaches to public diplomacy thematic communications and messaging. Coalition building and pooling resources with others' to achieve mutual goals can be much more effective than trying to do it all alone.

[2] Slaughter, Anne-Marie "America's Edge: Power in the Networked Century" Foreign Affairs, January/February 2009

The practices of public diplomacy in Africa and of public affairs on Africa policy are bound by mandates that come from several sources. Legal mandates such as Smith-Mundt and the Fulbright-Hayes regulations are explicit. They restrict resources for certain kinds of activities. "Understood mandates" are those that are widely assumed to be part of the job and stem from State's ingrained practices and corridor channels, not necessarily regulations. Mandates all along this spectrum are strong enough to dictate when, and for what, public diplomacy and public affairs are used as well as when they are left out of the policy process.

> "We also will reach out beyond governments, because we believe partnerships with people play a critical role in our 21st century statecraft."
> -- Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton

The priorities, mandates and principal resources of public diplomacy flow from the Africa Bureau (AF) and from the Office of the Undersecretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs (R). At posts, public affairs sections adhere to Mission priorities first and foremost. Public diplomacy programs and tools are most often run out of the bureau of Educational and Cultural Exchanges (ECA) or International Information Programs (IIP). The AF Bureau's and Missions' public diplomacy and public affairs staff must collegially tap into, and show results for, other bureaus and occasionally agencies.

The Africa Bureau has five policy pillars and AF public diplomacy and public affairs further and support all five – strengthen democratic institutions; mitigate and prevent conflict; foster broad-based economic growth; enhance access to education and combat disease, and combat transnational threats – as well as global themes such as climate change, food security, and outreach to Muslim populations in particular.

In addition, R's "Strategic Imperatives for 21st Century Public Diplomacy" certainly will guide public diplomacy in Africa: shape the narrative: develop proactive outreach strategies to inform, inspire, and persuade; expand and strengthen people-to-people relationships to build mutual trust and respect; better inform policy-making; ensure foreign policy is informed up front by an understanding of attitudes and opinions of foreign publics; combat violent extremism: counter violent extremist voices, discredit and delegitimize violent extremism and empower credible local voices; and deploy resources in line with current priorities - strengthen structures and processes to ensure coordinated and effective public diplomacy

III. MAKING BETTER POLICY AND MORE OF A PUBLIC IMPACT

Over the past four months AF/PDPA has defined the philosophy, role, audiences, mission, and core functions of AF/PDPA. This organizational development plan was developed by AF/PDPA through a consultative and collaborative process. It does not seek to catalogue the full panoply of activities that the office engages in every day. It seeks to provide a strategic direction for the many daily activities – from responding to taskers, to recruiting officers for field positions, to producing daily press clips, to informing PAOs about Washington's latest policy initiative – so that the each AF/PDPA staff member can make smart decisions about how to increase the value, impact and results of his/her work. It also seeks, to the extent feasible, to evaluate and measure these to be able to align human and financial resources with strategic priorities.

This plan seeks to build on the office's considerable strengths which include, but are by no means limited to the outstanding teamwork displayed by most staff members on projects ranging from innovative training for LES, to trip paper; the leadership by example of the office director, deputy, PACO and public affairs officer in providing policy-makers and PAOs with regular, valued updates and input; the "go to" responsiveness to posts' needs of the cultural coordinator and ARS Paris; the extensive networking for the Bureau of the outreach coordinator across the United States; the close, collaborative working relationship with IIP in particular; the transparency and inclusiveness within AF/PDPA as to how funding decisions are made, and, the media interview clearance and press guidance processes. The latter works so well that PAOs and AF office directors repeatedly told the contractor "whatever you do, don't change it."

Throughout this plan is an ongoing commitment by AF/PDPA personnel to a new approach to their work. The commitment is to increased initiative, more strategic thinking, more frequent engagement in policy-making processes, and a fuller understanding by every staff member of how his/her work contributes to the larger whole. This may sound obvious, but it is not a minor shift and is a day-to-day challenge in the State culture that tasks down, values procedure over creativity, and expects quick responses and turn-around from lower levels but does not place priority on keeping them informed.

The new Public Diplomacy Deputy Assistant Secretary (PD-DAS) will play a major leadership role in implementing this plan. AF/PDPA's leadership team (Director, Deputy, PACO, Chief of Public Affairs, and Cultural Coordinator) is responsible for the pace of implementation, but actually achieving the goals will require all staff members to reshape their approach to their own jobs. It is generally not a matter of just doing more. Most AF/PDPA personnel are already juggling large work loads. It is a matter of working more strategically, in some cases more in depth, and focusing more on impact and purpose.

I. AF/PDPA is valued for public diplomacy leadership in Africa and for public affairs leadership on Africa policy in the U.S.

II. Policy-making on Africa is informed by an understanding of public perspectives. State depends on AF/PDPA for expertise and advice on understanding, informing, engaging, and persuading publics in Africa and informing the U.S. public.

III. The conduct of public diplomacy in Africa and AF's public affairs in the U.S. is strengthened and enhanced via the achievement of specific, measurable public diplomacy and public affairs program objectives.

IV. AF attracts and retains a diverse, high-caliber public diplomacy and public affairs workforce.

V. Resources to engage publics in Africa and in America are sufficient and deployed in line with policy priorities.

During this organizational development process AF/PDPA staff and stakeholders proposed many more thoughtful ideas and specific strategies, steps, and actions to achieve these five goals than there are time or resources available. Seven cross-cutting strategies arose out of the list of over a hundred specific actions that the contractor compiled from interviews and discussions with the field and in Washington.

STRATEGIES

A. Address location and restructure to close access and communications gaps with AF, better support and guide the field, facilitate AF engagement with target domestic audiences, support expanding PD portfolios, make positions more desirable, and facilitate AF inter-office teamwork.

B. Engage fully in AF policy-making processes, especially the paper process.

C. Raise visibility of PD and PA work in AF.

D. Build and retain expertise in the field and in AF/PDPA.

E. Increase AF/PDPA networking and coalition building.

F. Empower the field and AF/PDPA

G. Align resources with policy priorities and stretch resources via partnerships with other USG, private, and non-profit organizations to maximize resource coordination on shared policy and program goals.

In early May 2010, as a result of this organizational development process, Assistant Secretary Carson approved major physical restructuring of AF/PDPA. AF/PDPA will embed PD desk officers in the geographic offices using a model similar to that currently used by WHA and EUR. As soon as space is available, PD desks will be relocated to the corresponding AF geographic office (AF/C, AF/W, AF/E and AF/S) in the Harry S. Truman main State building (HST). The PD desk officers will be an integral part of the geographic offices' day-to-day work as public diplomacy experts. These officers will be rated by AF/PDPA and reviewed by the geographic office director, serving as members of both office teams.

Embedding will help close the existing chasm between AF/PDPA and the rest of the bureau, but it is far from a perfect solution and certainly not a cure-all. Shifting of physical office space will jumpstart changes to the "out of sight, out of mind" mentality which has affected AF/PDPA for many years. It will directly address the OIG reports concerns that "the current situation, with AF/PDPA offices across the street from the main Department building, exacerbates the alienation between AF and AF/PDPA." It will open other gaps. The distance between the AF/PDPA "home office" in SA-3 and the AF geographic offices on the fourth and fifth floors of HST will make supervision of and communication with the desks more challenging than EUR's or WHA's experience. Included in this plan are actions to mitigate anticipated new gaps and to address proactively potential thorny areas. The AF/PDPA leadership team has discussed potential pitfalls. They are ready to take on the added management challenges that embedding creates.

In addition, on AF/PDPA's recommendation, Assistant Secretary Carson asked AF/EX to conduct in FY 2010 a zero-based reconsideration of physical space based on office function, size, and resources available. This was a result of AF/PDPA's organizational development analysis that pointed to the need to improve coordination between the domestic outreach side of AF/PDPA and other AF offices' cultivation and engagement of domestic audiences (such as NGO, Diaspora, and other constituency briefings) as well as between the public diplomacy program side of AF/PDPA and the work of other AF offices on engaging priority public audiences in Africa (such as women, civil society, entrepreneurs, and Muslim communities). It is expected that consultation and collaboration among the various public engagement activities of the bureau's functional offices – RSA, EPS, and PDPA – will be enhanced by locating AF's regional government-to-people portfolios in closer proximity, and that as a result AF/PDPA will be more engaged in the Bureau's policy-making processes.

As physical reorganization is not sufficient on its own to fully integrate AF/PDPA, this plan contains the steps AF/PDPA has agreed to take to redefine responsibilities, portfolios and expectations to enable the PD desks to build expertise in their geographic portfolios, the PA section to build expertise in the U.S.-based African diaspora and in new and social media, and the PACO, cultural coordinator, deputy and office director to continue to focus region-wide with improved administrative support. This plan includes a commitment from the new Public Diplomacy Deputy Assistant Secretary as to the role he will play in encouraging the rest of the Africa Bureau to improve its attitude toward, and raise its expectations of, AF/PDPA. Ensuring foreign policy-making is informed by an understanding of public perspectives is a two-way street. AF's geographic and functional offices must collaborate more fully with AF/PDPA.

Early in FY2011, Diplomacy 3.0 will provide two new country affairs (desk) officer positions enabling the West Africa portfolio of 16 posts to be split into two. The program and project specialist position will be reconfigured to support additional programs. The media officer position will be refocused with an emphasis on social/online media and additional diaspora outreach. AF/PDPA seeks to add two new positions in FY 2013 – a deputy planning and coordinating officer and another media officer. All of AF/PDPA will work to better inform policy-making.

Better input into policy also means doing a better job of reporting on public sentiment and on the media, academic and civil society perspectives and environments in country as well as capturing the impact and results of public diplomacy activities. AF has asked officers in the field to do more strategic reporting. This is also expected of officers at public affairs sections. In Washington, AF/PDPA officers will do more to inform themselves and policymakers by reading INR, Open Source, and non-governmental public opinion polls and analysis as well as networking with the academic communities that study Africa. In order to improve reporting on the results of public diplomacy programs, assessment and reporting tools must be improved. Measuring the impact of public diplomacy programming is expensive and, if not done using longitudinal methods, imprecise. AF/PDPA is committed to working with R to improve reporting and measurement of public diplomacy results and to setting expectations for this office and the field to move beyond counting activities to counting impact.

Carrying out the core function of oversight of, and support for, the field means more than emails and phone calls to posts from Washington (although the value of the weekly phone call between PD desk and PAO should not be underestimated). Africa does not have many senior PAO positions. Thirty-one out of 44 AF PAO positions are graded for mid- or entry-level officers (FS-02 and below). Many PAOs are the sole public diplomacy officer at post and on their first PAO tour. As AF/PDPA desk officers have not always had field PD experience, this plan contains actions to build expertise in Washington and the field including adding more regional and Washington training opportunities, coaching/mentoring less-experienced PAOs by more experienced officers, manuals and written guides, as well as academic and scientific fellows who bring specialized expertise into AF/PDPA. These will help the field be more effective, but will not solve the need for additional LES and FSO positions in public affairs sections across the continent.

While AF/PDPA can and must recruit and build public diplomacy officers for service in Africa, there are few, very limited actions the office can take on its own that will make an appreciable difference in retaining good public diplomacy officers at posts. This is not just a problem for public diplomacy in Africa. The Department's assignments priority on Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan, including the promise of "linked assignments" and the financial incentives that come with service in these countries has had the unintended effect of creating a disincentive to serving in Africa. As many posts in Africa are two year tours, the already systematic every-other-year assignment gaps are multiplied by curtailments of officers to serve in those countries the Department considers a higher priority.

Several of the specific actions in this plan are designed to raise the visibility of AF public diplomacy and public affairs work in order to garner a regular seat at the policy table, better represent PAOs in Washington, attract more FSO bidders, and increase interagency and public-private networking. Coalition building and public-private partnerships are a critical part of stretching public diplomacy and public affairs resources.

Separating AF/PDPA by embedding and taking on more work – new audiences, partners, and drafting and reporting responsibilities – will mean working more time, working more efficiently, or letting go of some duties. Some actions in this plan (such as restructuring one of AF/PDPAs most highly visible products - the morning clips) will evaluate whether the time it takes to perform a task can be reduced.

IV. STRATEGIC PLAN FOR AFRICA BUREAU PUBLIC DIPLOMACY AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Philosophy of AF Public Diplomacy (PD) and Public Affairs (PA)

- PD and PA advance foreign policy objectives; they are essential tools for national security and require credibility and legitimacy.
- PD and PA communicate U.S. government Africa policies to domestic and foreign audiences and inform policy-making including, but not limited to, providing opportunities for policy-makers to listen to these audiences.
- PD creates an enabling environment for U.S. government policies and U.S. national interests in Africa through programming that strikes the right balance of short- and long-term engagement activities.
- PAOs and the public affairs sections of U.S. Missions abroad have the lead on public affairs programming and media work in country including, under chief of mission authority, coordination of interagency public outreach and messaging in country.
- PD works best when the field is trained, trusted and empowered to act and when tools and messages are adaptable to local realities and the perspectives of the target audience.
- AF/PDPA personnel are expected to be an essential part of the web of America's diverse networks of public, private and civic actors on Africa, representing the Department, modeling integrity, and learning continuously.
- AF/PDPA works as a team of high-caliber experts, each with a specialty supporting and backstopping each other, as well as coaching and cultivating entry-level officers and less-experienced colleagues in the field and in Washington.
- AF/PDPA fosters open communication and encourages creativity and innovation.
- Effective PD and PA require personnel who reflect, respect, understand, and positively engage the diverse composition of our nation and of Africa. AF/PDPA is committed to a diverse workforce.

Mission Statement - AF/PDPA

The mission of AF public diplomacy and public affairs is to support the achievement of U.S. foreign policy goals and objectives, advance national interests, and enhance national security by understanding, engaging, informing and influencing the people of Africa and informing the people of the United States of America in order to create an enabling environment for a healthy, mutually-beneficial U.S.-African partnership.

This engagement takes place via daily communications with the media and others, targeted outreach initiatives to audiences in Africa and in the U.S. related to specific themes, and longer-term people-to-people relationship building efforts between Africa and the United States.

Role of AF/PDPA

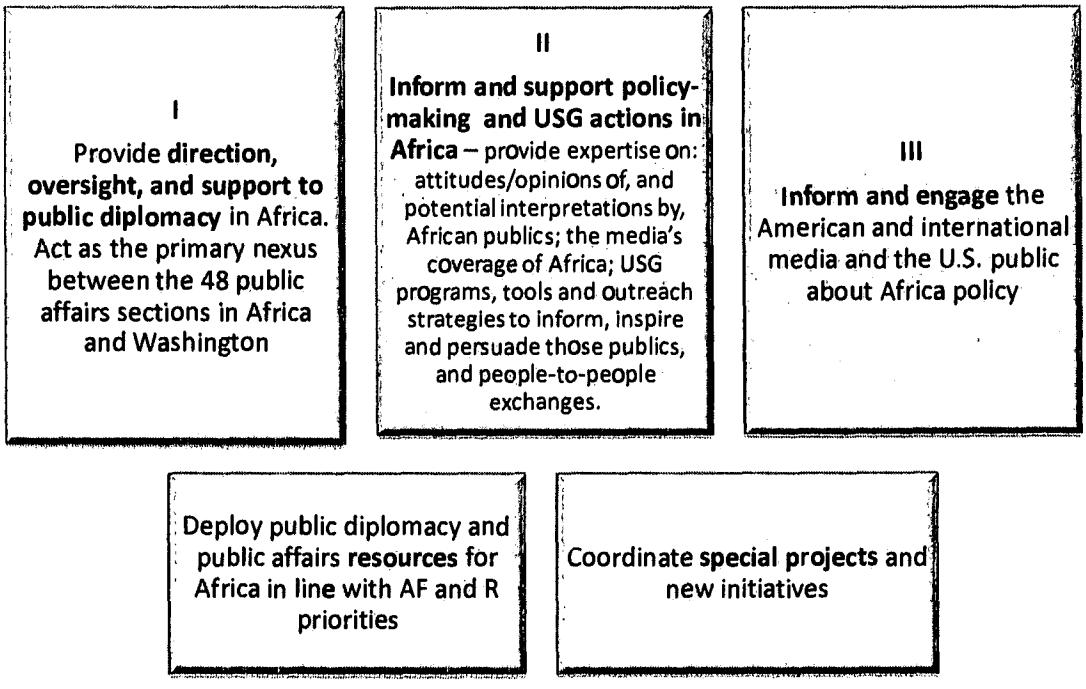
State Department's expertise on public diplomacy programs and activities in Africa, on the regional African public and media context, and on the Department's engagement with the media and American audiences on African issues resides in AF/PDPA.

AF/PDPA also houses the Africa Bureau's experts on Africa's cultural, educational, and media environments, on electronic social networking/social media in Africa, and on crafting thematic communications strategies for regional Africa policy.



Information on AF/PDPA staffing is found in Annex III

AF/PDPA Priority Audiences

(Note: these are the priority audiences for the Washington-based AF/PDPA staff. Priority audiences for posts and ARS Paris are different.)

1. AF Posts
2. AF Bureau
3. R
4. PA, ECA, IIP
5. other State
6. U.S. and global media
7. U.S-based public (Americans and Diaspora), and
8. other USG.

AF/PDPA Core Functions

Additional information on these core functions is found in Annex IV.

AF/PDPA GOALS

2010-2014

I. AF/PDPA is valued for public diplomacy leadership in Africa and for public affairs leadership on Africa policy in the U.S.

Public Diplomacy Leadership

A primary function of the public diplomacy office in a regional bureau must be to guide and oversee public diplomacy operations and programming at U.S. Missions. Management of public diplomacy resources, support, and training for the field are major parts of AF/PDPA's responsibilities. This work is, and will remain, largely invisible to the AF policy process. The bureau relies on AF/PDPA to align public diplomacy resources with policy priorities and national interest and implement public diplomacy programs that produce tangible results.

Longer-term educational and mutual understanding activities in particular are labor and resource intensive and results may not be apparent for years. These engagement activities need to be shaped by AF/PDPA.

In order to oversee and support the field more effectively, AF/PDPA will take steps to improve interaction between the PD desks, PAOs and AF's geographic offices, and to engage more in interagency and intradepartmental networking and coalition building in Washington. AF posts will increase reporting of their results and impact, not just activities (outcomes not just outputs). AF/PDPA staff will build their own knowledge of, and expertise in, public diplomacy activities, staff and environments in Africa.

By 2014, AF/PD will be D.C.'s experts on the full range of PD activities on the ground at AF posts, networked in the U.S. and linked to the field sufficiently to promote and garner resources and opportunities for posts.

Public Affairs Leadership

The State Department's expertise on engagement with the U.S. domestic and major global media and with targeted domestic audiences on Africa policy resides in AF/PDPA. AF/PA is responsible for serving as AF's spokespeople and providing the Department and posts with press guidance and media relations expertise. AF/PA cultivates the U.S.-based media (traditional and social/new) and informs AF and posts about Africa coverage in the U.S. and major global media. AF/PA leads coordination of AF's domestic public speaking (non-Congressional) and AF Speakers Bureau. AF/PA has the lead in AF on U.S.-based diaspora engagement and on interagency communications strategy and messaging related to Africa policy.

By 2014, AF/PA will be valued equally for its communications strategy, public outreach, and media expertise and will be recognized as AF bureau spokespeople, as appropriate.

II. Policy-making on Africa is informed by an understanding of public perspectives. State depends on AF/PDPA for expertise and advice on understanding, informing, engaging, and persuading publics in Africa and informing the U.S. public.

> "The ear of the leader must ring with the voices of the people."
> -- Woodrow Wilson

Policy on any topic that affects Africa should be informed by an understanding of how the global media as well as public audiences in Africa may receive and then re-broadcast their own interpretation of U.S. government actions, and of U.S. government programs, communications strategies, tools and outreach strategies to inform, inspire and persuade those publics. Africa policy also should be informed by an understanding of the interests of the American public.

By 2014, AF/PD will be:

- State's experts on the full range of PD activities on the ground at AF posts, able to communicate to Washington's non-PD policy-makers how and when PD programs make a difference in the local environment or target audience;
- AF's experts on Africa's academic, media, and cultural environments and trends, and on electronic social networking/social media in Africa, and
- AF's experts in developing "campaign style" communications strategies.

By 2014, AF/PA will be:

- AF's experts on outreach to U.S.-based African diaspora and domestic audiences and
- AF's experts in U.S. domestic media relations including traditional and internet-based media.

III. The conduct of public diplomacy in Africa and AF's public affairs in the U.S. is strengthened and enhanced via the achievement of specific, measurable public diplomacy and public affairs program objectives.

Public diplomacy and public affairs support U.S. foreign policy goals, advance national interests, and enhance national security through the measurable achievement of program objectives aligned with policy priorities and targeted strategically at priority audiences. An enabling environment for a healthy, mutually-beneficial U.S.-African partnership is created through greater U.S. government engagement of the diaspora, women, youth, faith communities, and public opinion leaders in academia, business, media, civil society and the arts.

By 2014, AF/PDPA will support Africa policy across a range of priorities and also will have achieved measurable results in specific areas of expertise.

AF Public Affairs Program Objectives

A. Engage U.S. non-traditional and internet-based media on Africa policy
B. Understand and engage U.S.-based diaspora groups

AF Public Diplomacy Program Objectives

A. An Informed Public
B. Options for Young People – English Teaching and Educational Advising
C. Strengthened American Voices

IV. AF attracts and retains a diverse, high-caliber public diplomacy and public affairs workforce.

AF/PDPA positions should be of such value, substance and visibility that they attract and retain FSOs and civil servants eager to be part of the Africa policymaking hub with a focus on understanding and influencing public opinion and sowing the

> "You are not here merely to make a living. You are here in order to enable the world to live more amply, with greater vision, with a finer spirit of hope and achievement. You are here to enrich the world, and you impoverish yourself if you forget that errand."

seeds for long-term mutual understanding.

AF Foreign Service positions in the field should have a reputation as challenging, satisfying, and career-enhancing where an officer can make a difference.

By 2014, AF/PDPA will be fully-staffed by a diverse, highly-qualified team of foreign and civil service personnel (entry-level to senior-level) who chose to work in AF/PDPA.

V. Resources to engage publics in Africa and in America are sufficient and deployed in line with policy priorities.

AF/PDPA administers public diplomacy resources for the field and works closely with R, ECA and IIP to ensure public diplomacy tools and resources support policy priorities, as well as networks with other bureaus in State, U.S. government agencies, and with the private and non-profit sectors to maximize coordination of resources on shared policy and program goals.

STRATEGIES

A. Address location and restructure to close access and communications gaps with AF, better support and guide the field, facilitate AF engagement with target domestic audiences, support expanding PD portfolios, make positions more desirable, and facilitate AF inter-office teamwork.

B. Engage fully in AF policy-making processes, especially the paper process.

C. Raise visibility of PD and PA work in AF.

D. Build and retain expertise in the field and in AF/PDPA.

E. Increase AF/PDPA networking and coalition building.

F. Empower the field and AF/PDPA

G. Align resources with policy priorities and stretch resources via partnerships with other USG, private, and non-profit organizations to maximize resource coordination on shared policy and program goals.

ACTIONS

Following are the priority actions that AF/PDPA has committed to taking over the next few years to achieve the goals in this plan. These changes are all designed to address performance challenges, take advantage of opportunities, and utilize one or more of the above strategies. Implementation has already begun on many of these actions.

Actions to Achieve Both Public Diplomacy & Public Affairs Goals

1. Engage more in the formal paper process & report more to the Front Office (submit DARs, Action Memos etc.)
   Start Timing: June 2010
   Lead: All Office
   Type: Internal
   Needed to begin: 0
   Direct Financial Implications: none
   Goals: II
   Strategies: B, C
   Performance Indicator: One DAR or unsolicited info memo weekly from PDPA

2. Increase admin support to public affairs staff and cultural coordinator
   Plan of Action: OMS and Program/Project Specialist duties reconfigured to include support to public affairs and the cultural coordinator.
   Start Timing: Summer 2010
   Lead: PDOD
   Type: Internal and HR
   Needed to begin: 0
   Direct Financial Implications: none
   Goals: IV, V
   Strategies: A
   Performance Indicators: Updated work requirements for Program/Project Specialist and OMS; PDOD conducts analysis of workloads and work flow after 6 months and adjusts accordingly.

3. Retain special projects/assistant cultural affairs position
   Plan of Action: Current senior advisor for cultural affairs is in AF/PDPA on a Y tour and will rotate out summer of 2010. Diplomacy 3.0 country affairs officer position established for FY 2011; portfolio for this new position to be configured to handle cultural affairs support, cross-cutting theme projects such as Muslim engagement and entrepreneurship, and Washington-based major events and summits.
   Start Timing: January 2011 ELO begins
   Lead: Deputy, CC
   Type: HR
   Needed to begin: Desk space
   Direct Financial Implications: none
   Goals: I, II, IV
   Strategies: A
   Performance Indicators: January 2011 ELO begins

4. AF Bureau BSRP includes public diplomacy and public affairs goal paper
   Plan of Action: BSRP baselines established in FY 2010.
   Start Timing: May 2010
   Lead: Advisor & PDOD

Type: internal
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: II
Strategies: B
Performance Indicators: FY 2012, FY 2013, and FY 2014 BSRPs include public diplomacy and public affairs goal paper and performance indicators met for FY 2011, FY 2012, and FY 2013

5. Increase coordination and clarify PDPA roles to AF functional offices
Plan of Action:
   a. AF/EX conducts a bureau-wide, zero-based analysis of office space. AF/PDPA seeks, to the extent feasible, to facilitate increased collaboration between the domestic outreach side of AF/PDPA and other AF offices' cultivation and engagement of domestic audiences (such as NGO, Diaspora, and other constituency briefings) as well as between the public diplomacy program side of AF/PDPA and the work of other AF offices on engaging priority public audiences in Africa (such as women, civil society, entrepreneurs, and Muslim communities). If office space can be reconfigured, collaboration among and between the bureau's functional offices will be greatly enhanced by locating AF's functional offices in particular in closer proximity to each other.
   b. Orientation session on public diplomacy/public affairs work for Front Office staff after 2010 summer rotation cycle. Orientation sessions conducted whenever there is a change in front office staff assistants, or as often as needed.

Start Timing: May 2010
Lead: PD-DAS
Type: AF
Needed to begin: AF/EX space evaluation
Direct Financial Implications: yes, moving/remodeling
Goals: I, II
Strategies: A, C, E
Performance Indicators: Six months after physical move, the front office, PDPA, RSA, and EPS evaluate degree of closer coordination; after orientation sessions - decrease in mis-directed taskings.

6. Establish all-AF/PDPA electronic filing and contact system
Plan of Action: Enable new officers to get up to speed more quickly in their portfolios through a functioning filing system. WAE or contractor hired to clean up and sort AF/PDPA classified paper files and electronic files stored on the "T" drive and move to a Department of State SharePoint filing system and to set up an AF/PDPA all-office contact database for non-State contacts.

Lead: PDOD
Type: Internal
Needed to begin: WAE or contractor

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770301 Date: 08/31/2015

Direct Financial Implications: yes; cost of WAE or contractor
Goals: V
Strategies: D, G
Performance Indicators: By December 2010, filing system and files in line with State regulations and contact database established. AF/PDPA utilizes and maintains the filing system and contact database.

7. Reconfigure media officer position to non-traditional media and outreach position
Plan of Action: With the development of social and new media capabilities in the field a high priority, this position will be dedicated half-time to Washington support of expanding posts' technical and programming abilities in this area. Officer will liaise with resource offices in IIP and elsewhere at State and communicate this expertise to the field. The other half of the position will be dedicated to supporting the enhanced diaspora relations coordination. In FY 2011 – reconfigure current media officer position. New FTE for media officer position submitted in FY 2012 BSRP but not accepted by the AF Bureau. Resubmit for FY 2013 BSRP.
Start Timing: FY 2011
Lead: PA Chief
Type: internal
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: yes, FTE
Goals: I, II, V
Strategies: A, E, G
Performance Indicators: PAO, PDOD and PA Chief satisfaction with social/new media coverage and outreach support. Position duties and responsibilities to be reviewed after first six months; new FTE established by FY 2014.

8. New deputy PACO/special projects civil service position
Plan of Action: AF/PDPA established thematic teams to track and communicate developments to PAOs in priority AF policy areas: women's empowerment, Muslim engagement, food security, economic development, environment and good governance. The PACO is responsible for staffing these teams, from public affairs and public diplomacy employees of AF/PDPA. The PACO needs assistance in both managing the field supervision and support aspects of the position as well as the thematic team responsibilities. Establish a Civil Service FTE in this role to give the office continuity and a knowledge base over time. Civil Service position submitted in FY 2012 BSRP but not accepted by Bureau. Resubmit for FY 2013 BSRP.
Lead: PDOD
Type: AF & HR
Needed to begin: FTE & space
Direct Financial Implications: yes; personnel costs
Goals: I, II, IV
Strategies: A, E, G
Performance Indicators: New position filled by FY 2014

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770301 Date: 08/31/2015

9. PILOT: "Public Environment" issue paper for A/S & higher trips
Plan of Action: PD-DAS will assess public diplomacy and public affairs perspectives and issues in trip paper and decide whether an additional issue paper is needed. May decide to pilot media environment or other as an "optional issues" paper.
Start Timing: FY2011
Lead: PD-DAS
Type: AF Front Office decision
Needed to begin: AF approval
Direct Financial Implications: None
Goals: II
Strategies: B
Performance Indicators: Utility for the traveler. Informal satisfaction/utility evaluation conducted after pilot.

Actions to Achieve Public Diplomacy Goals

1. PD desk officers develop PD, educational, cultural, media, and social networking expertise in portfolio countries
Plan of Action:
   a. AF/W portfolio of 16 countries too large to expect in-depth expertise in all countries. Add an assistant AF/W PD desk officer to this portfolio using a Diplomacy 3.0 country affairs position authorized for FY 2010;
   b. FSI training for new PD desk officers as appropriate (AF area studies/Washington tradecraft/Intro to PD);
   c. Formal handover notes from departing staff beginning summer 2010;
   d. PD desks travel to every post in portfolio at least once during tour;
   e. PD Desk Officer Manual that will include checklists for PAO consultations, information about the portfolio posts, administrative information about AF/PDPA, and more;
   f. Beginning in summer FY 2010, PD desks attend geographic offices' internal meetings whether or not embedded. PACO speaks with geographic area directors to begin "virtual embedding";
   g. PD desks institute weekly conversation with portfolio PAOs

   Start Timing: summer 2010 cycle
   Leads: All PD
   Type: AF, HR, FSI, Internal
   Needed to begin: Space for new officer
   Direct Financial Implications: travel funds; moving/remodeling costs
   Goals: I, II
   Strategies: A, B, C, D
   Performance Indicators: PD desks travel to every post in portfolio at least once during tour beginning FY 2011; Advisor produces manual by July 2010; assistant AF/W PD desk officer begins FY 2011; AF/W, PAO, & PDPA satisfaction with AF/W PD desks evaluated 3 & 6 months after 2nd AF/W officer arrives; new PD desk officers take up portfolios properly trained; FY 2010 - AF/S handover notes. FY 2012 AF/W & AF/E handover notes; PAO satisfaction with desk officer support evaluated by PACO or Deputy six months into each desk's tour.

2. Embed desk officer positions in geographic offices

Plan of Action: The PD desk officers will be supervised by AF/PDPA but will be an integral part of the geographic offices' day-to-day work as public diplomacy experts, providing direction and support to PAOs in the field, and informing and supporting policy-making in AF by providing expertise on attitudes/opinions of target African audiences, potential interpretations by African publics of U.S. government policies and actions; U.S. government programs, tools and outreach strategies to inform, inspire, and persuade those publics, and people-to-people exchanges designed to build long-term ties. Officers rated by AF/PDPA PACO and reviewed by appropriate geographic office director. AF/PDPA leadership team and advisor set expectations for interaction between and among PD desks, AF/PDPA home office, PAOs and geographic offices with first set of newly embedded PD desk officers. AF/PDPA leadership team and advisor works on internal communications/coordination strategies designed to facilitate PDPA teamwork and information flows and bridge HST/SA-3 distance between desks and rest of AF/PDPA. For example, instituting very short daily meetings to update PD desks on AF/PDPA and to inform AF/PDPA about front office/other bureau thinking and priorities.

Start Timing: FY2010
Lead: PD-DAS, PDOD, Deputy and PACO
Type: AF
Needed to Begin: AF/EX space evaluation & desk space
Direct Financial Implications: moving/remodeling
Goals: I, II, IV
Strategies: A, B
Performance Indicators: 6 month evaluation examines stakeholder satisfaction -- Posts, Front Office, PD desk officers, home office, geographic offices; new PD desk officer position description and work requirements reflect expectations and core functions; evaluation of communications strategies/coordination meetings for participant satisfaction/utility after first two week, then again after three months.

3. Improve support for first-time PAOs

Plan of Action: Large post/small post shadow/buddy system established in Africa with mentoring of first-time PAOs by experienced PAOs in their sub-region. PAO SharePoint or other website or other means to share advice among themselves and continued management and program support from ARS. Also pursue with FSI a new Single Officer Post PAO training module that includes a formal mentoring for first-time PAOs at small posts around the world.

Start Timing: FY 2011
Lead: Deputy
Type: internal
Needed to begin: New course module – FSI; other travel funds
Direct Financial Implications: travel

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770301 Date: 08/31/2015

Goals: I, IV
Strategies: D, F
Performance Indicators: Coaching/mentoring system established for AF including strategic decision-making and post/Washington interaction and expectations; PAO evaluation of utility after first year of operation; module added to PAO training course at FSI specifically on single-officer posts.

4. Meet Specific Public Diplomacy Program Objectives
Plan of Action:
   a. Preserve current and establish new American Centers.
      FY 2010 baseline: Ouagadougou.
      FY 2011 – Maputo, Kinshasa and Lusaka upgraded;
      FY 2012 – Kano established;
      FY 2013 - Mombasa or elsewhere to reach goal of five new/refurbished American Centers by 2014;
   b. Double PD training opportunities in Africa.
      FY 2009 baseline: 3 courses offered; 75 LES & FSOs trained in strategic planning;
      FY 2010: new courses piloted. (9 – strategic planning, social media, alumni, grants, MAT & PD transition – for 150 participants in region);
      FY 2011: previous year experience evaluated and training plan established for FY 2011 & FY 2012;
      FY 2012 – 150 receive training in PD regionally.
   c. FSO position at South Africa Media Hub
   d. PAOs at PD transition posts - Add 8 PAO positions.
      FY 2010 Baseline: 9 posts with no PAO.
      FY 2011 - 7 new PAO positions filled and support/oversight plan for PD transition posts developed by PDPA;
      FY 2013 one additional PAO position established
   e. PILOT: Podcasting production and training capabilities at Public Affairs Sections in Africa. FY 2010 Pilot: AF/PDPA works with IIP to provide regional training & podcasting kits; FY 2010 & FY 2011 evaluation of results; FY 2011 decision on pilot project.
   f. Nearly 100% increase in English Access Microscholarship students.
      Baseline FY 2009: 900 new students in AF plus 900 currently studying under FY08 funding - 1,800 total.
      FY 2010 funding: 1,000 new students in AF plus 900 from FY09; Total - 1,900 students
   g. Educational advisors at every embassy in AF.

i. Pilot hand-held mobile devices for engagement/distribution of information. R/PPR completes Electronic Media Outreach Program Evaluation by FY 2011. These results and analysis inform future actions.

Start Timing: FY 2010
Leads: PDOD & Cultural Coordinator
Type: Coordination with R, OBO, ECA, and DS
Needed to begin: Appropriate approvals and funding
Direct Financial Implications: Yes, several Goals: III, IV, V
Strategies: C, D, E, F, G
Performance Indicators: 5 new/refurbished American Centers by 2014; Evaluation and training plan established by FY 2012; South Africa Media Hub position established and filled by FY 2011; 9 new PAO positions established with smooth transition from PD-lite to full PAS; successful pilot: 12 AF posts engaged in regular podcasting production and distribution; evaluation/assessment of podcasting effectiveness carried out in FY 2011; ENGLISH ACCESS MICROSCHOLARSHIP students: FY 2011 - 2,200 students total; FY 2012 - 2,500 students total; FY 2013 - 3000 students total; FY 2014 - 3,500 students total; Educational Advising: 25% increase in number of African students in American Universities by 2015 academic year; by FY 2014 - 4th RELO to cover parts of West and Central Africa; Hand-held mobile devices for engagement performance indicator TBD from results of Electronic Media Outreach Program Evaluation.

5. Streamline and improve results/impact and public environment reporting from the field
Plan of Action: Embrace the Mission Activity Tracker (MAT) and reduce requirements for PD activity reporting from the field on other platforms. MAT training for AF/PDPA; MAT expectations from PAOs; R/PPR adds MAT update "RSS-type" alert; AF/PDPA nominates for Outstanding MAT reporting awards, not posts. MAT training continues in the field in FY 2011 & FY 2012. Each PAS to submit at least one major analytical reporting cable a year.

Start Timing: FY 2010
Lead: Cultural Coordinator, PACO & PD-DAS
Type: Internal & Coordination with R/PPR, ECA, IIP
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: II
Strategies: D
Performance Indicators: From 12% results reporting in MAT to 50% results reporting in MAT.

6. Annual AF PAO Conference in Washington, DC.
Plan of Action: Link to R's global PAO conference. FY 2011 scheduled for October 2010.

Start Timing: FY 2011
Lead: PDOD & R
Type: Coordination
Needed to begin: Funding
Direct Financial Implications: travel
Goals: I, IV
Strategies: C, D, E, F
Performance Indicators: Participant satisfaction

7. MSRPs – PD included in all goal papers and specific PD goal paper
Baseline: FY 2012 MSRP posts given the option by R to include PD goal paper or not.

Start Timing: FY 2010
Lead: PACO, PD desks, PD-DAS
Type: Internal & R
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: II, V
Strategies: B, F, G
Performance Indicators: For FY2013 and FY 2014, PD is well incorporated into all MSRPs and separate PD goal paper from all posts.

8. Increase interagency coordination with an emphasis on Africom and USAID
Plan of Action: PD-DAS to take the lead once position is located in the front office. Will work on Washington-based interagency coordination and on ensuring PAOs have the lead on coordinating interagency messaging/media at posts. Meanwhile, AF/PDPA to identify appropriate public affairs/public engagement personnel in other agencies with a focus on Africom and USAID. PD desk officers to arrange and accompany PAOs to interagency consultations before heading to post.

Start Timing: FY 2011
Lead: PD-DAS & PACO
Type: AF & Coordination
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: I, II
Strategies: E, F
Performance Indicators: Interagency contact list for AF/PDPA. # of posts with mission-wide integrated communications strategies/media plans. Other performance indicators TBD by PD-DAS

9. AF/PDPA makes better use of public opinion polling/academic analysis and data on Africa
Plan of Action: PACO working with Fellow or intern to pull together guide to Open Source Center, INR, DoD, and private sector, public opinion polling. PD Desks and PACO to network with academic community in coordination with outreach coordinator. Baseline: In FY 2010 public opinion polling not routinely checked, accessed or used by AF/PDPA.

Start Timing: FY 2010
Lead: PACO
Type: Coordination w/INR and others
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: II
Strategies: B, D
Performance Indicators: AF/PDPA has access to and utilizes public opinion polling as part of their analysis and information sharing in AF. At least one DAR, info memo or trip paper references public opinion polling data per quarter.

10. Annual Franklin and/or Science & Technology Fellow in AF/PDPA

Start Timing: FY 2010
Lead: Deputy, PACO
Type: Done
Needed to begin: Completed.
Direct Financial Implications: travel, space and associated Fellow costs
Goals: II
Strategies: D, C
Performance Indicators: Annual fellows beginning in FY 2011; PDPA & Fellow satisfaction

11. Improve links to public-private partnerships

Plan of Action: New special projects/cultural affairs person will arrive on/about January 2011. This officer to gather information from other bureaus and offices (ECA, S/GPI, EB) on existing State Department public-private partnerships and coordinate with outreach coordinator and posts on interest in new partnerships.

Goals: I, II
Strategies: C
Performance Indicators: 100% of AF FY 2012 Chiefs of Missions performance evaluations include public affairs/public diplomacy achievements

Actions to Achieve Public Affairs Goals

1. Increase strategic value of outreach to the Africa Bureau
Plan of Action: In addition to current who, what, where, when and why, Speaker Bureau and Front Office speaking request template includes context, and strategic policy goal linkages. FY 2011 - establish baselines and measuring tool for assessing the impact of outreach. Clarify source for domestic outreach travel budget. Enter new contacts into AF/PDPA contact database.
Start Timing: June 2010
Lead: PA Chief
Type: Internal
Needed to begin: Contact database for contact entering
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: I, II, V
Strategies: C, G
Performance Indicators: Context, audience and strategic policy goal linkages standard for 100% of speaking requests; BSRP FY 12 Performance Indicator includes audience numbers tracked and beginning FY 2012, impact of outreach tracked.

2. Enhance Diaspora Relations Coordination
Plan of Action: AF/PDPA has the lead for the Africa Bureau on diaspora relations coordination. This will entail increasing outreach to engage new audiences. In FY 2010, the outreach coordinator with support from an intern or fellow, researches and evaluates African diaspora communities, liaises with S/GPI, AF/RSA and AF geographic offices to devise strategies for engagement, arranges discussions between diaspora and Bureau representatives, and communicates results and possible follow-up activities to relevant Bureau offices and to PAOs. FY 2011: Track number of communities reached and use outreach measuring tool to assess impact of outreach. Clarify use of AF/PDPA travel funds for domestic outreach.
Start Timing: FY 2010
Lead: PA Chief
Type: Coordination
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: travel funds
Goals: II, III
Strategies: D
Performance Indicators: FY 2011 - Establish diaspora outreach baseline.
Fulfill BSRP indicators: FY 2012 - 15% increase in outreach to African diaspora communities over FY 2011baseline. AF has utilizes an up-to-date diaspora outreach database. PDPA staff traveling in U.S. for domestic outreach purposes

3. Restructure morning media clips

Plan of Action: Analyzing and restructuring the morning news clips (one of the office's highest profile products) will either make it more valuable to readers or decrease the time that is spent compiling this product if its usefulness cannot be determined. Survey of media clip needs of Front Office, PAOs and AF office directors; analysis of major blogs and websites that cover Africa. Determine value-added PDPA clips can provide. Summer 2010 - survey designed and distributed

Lead: Advisor & Program Specialist
Type: internal
Needed to begin: 0
Direct Financial Implications: none
Goals: II, V
Strategies: C, G
Performance Indicators: clips have increased utility/importance to readers (reader satisfaction,) OR decreased production time (Fewer than 12 hours a week to produce)

4. Biweekly calendar of domestic outreach & media interviews

Plan of Action: Reinstate weekly coordination meeting with AF Front Office on A/S public speaking engagements. Bureau-wide public speaking compiled into a calendar and distributed (could be document sent via email, AF Opennet website calendar, Outlook calendar, or other.)

Approach & Methodology:

The contractor is using a classic collaborative strategic planning process for strengthening and sustaining organizational development and achievement grounded in the work of John M. Bryson and his book Strategic Planning for Public and Nonprofit Organizations, 3rd edition (John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 2004). Purpose trumps everything and the purpose must ultimately be to create public value.

This structured process included four phases:

A) The first phase was an assessment of the AF/PDPA office (weeks 1-8).
B) Phase two was the articulation of a common vision for what AF/PDPA's strategic role, function and results should be within the Bureau of African Affairs (Weeks 9-11).
C) The development and refinement of strategies to get from point A to point B as well as identifying performance measurements was phase three (Weeks 11-16) followed by the contractor writing up the plan (weeks 17-18). Phase four is then the actual implementation of these strategies (Week 16+).

A quietly, deliberately, disruptive process, inserting the contractor into the daily rhythms of the office including participation in routine meetings is designed to elicit strategic thinking during AF/PDPA's daily work. AF/PDPA staff has not hesitated to implement best practices as they arise.

The most important techniques utilized were individual thinking and group discussion. As the guide in this process, during the first phase the contractor is conducting on and off-site interviews of stakeholders within the Department of State in Washington D.C., in Kampala, Uganda during an FSI strategic planning course for Africa, and by phone to PAOs across Africa.

In addition to compiling the results of the interviews, as appropriate, the contractor also gathered information about trends, challenges and opportunities in Africa, reviewing pertinent internal and external documents; meeting weekly with the AF/PDPA Office Director and Deputy Director to review progress, share findings and consult on next steps; meeting weekly with a core group of AF/PDPA personnel who volunteered to form an internal, collaborative Organizational Development Team to review information gathered by the consultant and hash out ideas and concepts, and reviewing the substance of this Phase 1 report and its findings with the AF/PDPA office and individuals affected by this report.

The contractor assembled all materials from the questionnaires to the worksheets for analysis. The contractor has conducted and compiled all interviews. Fifty-three people were interviewed individually or in pairs.

During this first phase, "why" has been the most important question. For example: Why do you do X? Why does it matter? Why A and not B? Followed by "for whom?" (primary audience) and "what is the value added of that action/effort/paper?"

Annex III

AF/PDPA Staffing

AF/PDPA's domestic public affairs side has four dedicated positions to handle media, press guidance, statements, and outreach to the American public and the African diaspora in the United States. The public diplomacy side has seven positions in Washington and two for Americans at African Regional Services (ARS) in Paris. (ARS Paris provides programming tools and support to all African posts with an emphasis on Francophone countries and engages the sizeable Paris-based African media and diaspora communities.) Six people have portfolios that include both sides of the office: the office director, deputy director, administrative officer, program and project specialist, and OMS.

There are 48 posts in Africa, 39 of which have Public Affairs Sections headed by an American Public Affairs Officer (PAO). By mid-2011 this will be up to 46. About half the public affairs sections are single-officer sections, often an officer's first PD tour.

Other State bureaus have regional support specialists in public affairs sections in Africa including information resource officers, regional English language officers, and regional Information Resource Officers. In Kampala, an exemplary case, the PAO has opened the door to communications specialists from PEPFAR and other USG to sit in the Public Affairs Section. At other posts DoD MIST teams sit in the Mission's public affairs section.

AF/PDPA 2010-2014 Organizational Development Plan

Executive Summary

To address concerns raised by the OIG in its August 2009 inspection report of the Africa Bureau, the Office of Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs (AF/PDPA) has engaged in an organizational development process. Over the past few months AF/PDPA has defined the philosophy, role, mission, audiences, core functions, and value added of public diplomacy and public affairs in the Africa Bureau and set goals and strategies for the AF/PDPA office to excel.

The Department of State's expertise on public diplomacy programs and activities in Africa, on the regional African public and media context, and on the Department's engagement with the media and American audiences on African issues should reside in AF/PDPA.

The mission of Africa Bureau (AF) public diplomacy and public affairs is to support the achievement of U.S. foreign policy goals and objectives, advance national interests, and enhance national security by understanding, engaging, informing and influencing the people of Africa and informing the people of the United States of America in order to create an enabling environment and strong relationships for a healthy, mutually-beneficial U.S.-African partnership.

This four-year organizational development plan lays down specific goals, strategies and actions/changes that will facilitate the highest level of performance of the office's core functions, address the office's performance challenges, and take advantage of opportunities. Throughout this plan is an ongoing commitment by AF/PDPA personnel to a new approach to their work. The commitment is to increased initiative, more strategic thinking, more frequent and earlier engagement in policy-making processes, and a fuller understanding by every staff member of how his/her work contributes to the larger whole. Over the course of the next few months, the approach of each AF/PDPA staff member will change as will a number of roles and portfolios. This plan assumes that the rest of the AF Bureau not only will be receptive to these changes but also will pro-actively seek AF/PDPA expertise and collaboration as appropriate.

The most visible outcome of this organizational development process will be the physical reorganization in the Africa Bureau. As soon as space is available, AF/PDPA will embed public diplomacy desk officers in the AF geographic offices. In order to make space available and to increase coordination among the bureau's functional offices, all of which do some engaging of civil society and private-sector audiences in the United States and in Africa, Assistant Secretary Carson has asked the bureau's executive office to conduct a full-bureau analysis of office space based on function, size and resource available. This analysis will inform the ultimate decisions as to who sits where.

However, the most significant outcome of this process will not be the shuffling of office space, but the results. The current AF/PDPA team is constantly short-staffed but at its core is an innovative, talented team of Civil and Foreign Service experts in engaging publics and the media and building long-term relationships for the United States. With added expertise, further integration with the rest of the Bureau and a 21st century focus on networking, AF/PDPA will produce results: more effective public diplomacy in Africa and public affairs in the United States and better informed policy-making in Washington.

AF/PDPA is adopting five major goals and will use seven cross-cutting strategies to achieve the goals by taking dozens of specific steps and actions.

AF/PDPA Goals - By 2014:

I. AF/PDPA is valued for public diplomacy leadership in Africa and for public affairs leadership on Africa policy in the U.S.

II. Policy-making on Africa is informed by an understanding of public perspectives. State depends on AF/PDPA for expertise and advice on understanding, informing, engaging, and persuading publics in Africa and informing the U.S. public.

III. The conduct of public diplomacy in Africa and AF's public affairs in the U.S. is strengthened and enhanced via the achievement of specific, measurable public diplomacy and public affairs program objectives.

IV. AF attracts and retains a diverse, high-caliber public diplomacy and public affairs workforce.

V. Resources to engage publics in Africa and in America are sufficient and deployed in line with policy priorities.

Strategies

A. Address location and restructure to close access and communications gaps with AF, better support and guide the field, facilitate AF engagement with target domestic audiences, support expanding PD portfolios, make positions more desirable, and facilitate AF inter-office teamwork.

B. Engage fully in AF policy-making processes, especially the paper process.

C. Raise visibility of PD and PA work in AF.

D. Build and retain expertise in the field and in AF/PDPA.

E. Increase AF/PDPA networking and coalition building.

F. Empower the field and AF/PDPA

G. Align resources with policy priorities and stretch resources via partnerships with other USG, private, and non-profit organizations to maximize resource coordination on shared policy and program goals.

UNCLASSIFIED U.S. Department of State Case No. F-2014-20439 Doc No. C05770302 Date: 08/31/2015

Actions to Achieve Both Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs Goals

1. Engage more in the paper process (report more to the Front Office via DARs, Info Memos etc.)
2. Increase administrative support to public affairs staff and cultural coordinator
3. Retain special projects/assistant cultural affairs position
4. AF Bureau BSRP includes public diplomacy and public affairs goal paper
5. Increase coordination and clarify PDPA roles to AF functional offices
6. Establish all-AF/PDPA electronic filing and contact systems
7. Reconfigure media officer position to non-traditional media and outreach position
8. New deputy PACO/special projects civil service position
9. Pilot if appropriate: "Public Environment" issue paper for A/S and higher trips

Public Diplomacy Actions

1. PD desk officers develop PD, educational, cultural, media, and social networking expertise in portfolio countries
2. Embed desk officer positions in geographic offices
3. Improve support for first-time PAOs
4. Meet Specific Public Diplomacy Program Objectives:
    a. Preserve current and establish new American Centers.
    b. Double PD training opportunities in Africa.
    c. FSO position at South Africa Media Hub
    d. PAOs at PD-transition posts.
    e. PILOT: Podcasting production capabilities at Public Affairs Sections in Africa.
    f. Nearly 100% increase in ACCESS scholarship students by 2014.
    g. Educational advisors at every embassy in AF.
    h. Double number of Regional English Language Officers to 4 by FY 2014.
    i. Pilot hand-held mobile devices for engagement/distribution of information.
5. Streamline and improve results/impact and public environment reporting from the field (Embrace MAT)
6. Annual AF PAO Conference in Washington, DC.
7. MSRPs – PD included in all goal papers and specific PD goal paper
8. Increase interagency coordination with an emphasis on Africom and USAID
9. AF/PDPA makes better use of public opinion polling/academic analysis and data on Africa
10. Annual Franklin and/or Science & Technology Fellow in AF/PDPA
11. Increase links to public-private partnerships
12. Chief of Mission EERs include public affairs achievements

Public Affairs Actions

1. Increase strategic value of outreach to the Africa Bureau
2. Enhance Diaspora Relations Coordination
3. Restructure morning media clips
4. Biweekly calendar of domestic outreach and media interviews
5. PD-DAS takes on principal AF Bureau spokesperson role
6. Internal marketing - update AF/PDPA information on State's internal websites

Hi Lona, I just saw the S video for Mother's Day: After nearly 10 years of working for the Department, this ranks as one of my proudest, most fulfilling moments of serving as a Foreign Service Officer.

B6

Clearly I'm not the only one who has made these sacrifices or who has these frustrations; Secretary Clinton has heard our struggles (indeed has gone through her own struggles as a professional mom!), and she truly gets it.

I just wanted to tell somebody, and I remembered your name from the women's conference in December. Forgive this long message. Happy Mother's Day, and congratulations on working with such an incredible person.

Subject: Kenyan Vice Foreign Minister bio

Madam Secretary,

As requested, below is a brief bio (compiled by DRL, INR, and AF) of Kenyan Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs Richard Momoima Onyonka, who you met in Krakow at the Community of Democracies. Please let me know if you would like any further information or follow up on this.

Thanks,
Mike

Richard Momoima Onyonka is a Kenyan politician and belongs to the People's Democratic Party. Born in 1962 and hailing from the Bogeka clan, VM Momoima has lived in Otamba, Nyamataro, Mosocho and Nairobi. In 1982, following the failed Kenyan coup d'état attempt to overthrow President Daniel Arap Moi's government, VM Momoima was among the 900 people that were jailed. However, in 1984, he returned to the University of Nairobi and graduated with a Bachelors degree in commerce a year later. After graduation, VM Momoima attended North Carolina State University where he graduated with a Masters degree in management. He returned to Kenya in 1992 during the first multi party elections to help his father (then incumbent MP for Kitutu Chache and Minister for Planning and National Development) who was seeking re-election on a KANU (Kenya African National Union) ticket. VM Momoima's first political opportunity arose when his father passed away in 1996, which prompted an election in which he lost to a new comer during the party (KANU) nominations. Since the Kenyan parliamentary election in 2007, VM Momoima has represented the Kitutu Chache Constituency in the National Assembly of Kenya.

A financial economist by profession, VM Momoima currently runs personal businesses in Nairobi and Kisii and has held positions in the Kisii KANU branch. His priorities include economic empowerment, particularly for youth and women, education, and poverty reduction.

Jake, Joe,
Here is the update from IO and PRM for the Secretary (as you recall she had met with the outgoing head of UNFPA):

Eric and I would like to update you on the Secretary-General's selection process of the next head of UNFPA.

Working closely with PRM and USUN, we gathered 22 names as possible candidates from various sources, including NGOs, governments, and respected individuals in the health sector. We whittled down this list to three people who have qualifications that we believe are necessary for the job: a deep understanding of and support for UNFPA's reproductive health/family planning mission and its critical role in implementing the ICPD Program of Action, strong leadership and advocacy skills, and strong management ability to oversee an organization with over 2000 employees worldwide.

We see the leading candidates as:

USUN concurs and is in touch with the SG's office to convey our views. The SG will make his own shortlist based on a UN review panel's recommendations. He is expected to announce his selection in October to allow the designee some overlap with the incumbent, Thoraya Obaid, whose term expires at the end of the year. We will keep you apprised as the process continues.

Re: The day after Gordon

Whatever the outcome, whichever party ultimately makes a pact with the Lib-Dems, or whether neither does, the next British government will be remarkably weak, flimsy and fly apart within months. That is the only certainty now.

On Gordon's political suicide, David, Labour: Neither David Miliband nor Shaun (who has been constantly on the phone with Gordon and by his side since the election as a sort of therapist) were privy to the decision; nor did Gordon tell either before making his announcement on the steps of No. 10. Gordon's confidant in contemplating his end was only Peter, the penultimate scene (there must be at least one more) of their twisted relationship rooted in the Tony-Gordon-Peter triangle now transmuted into the perverse Gordon-Peter-David triangle. David is the heir, the son, "Our Boy," as Anji Hunter describes him to me, playing a version of the Tony role. Shaun and David met alone for an hour and a half late last night to discuss the whole situation. David is well aware of Peter's perversity, that Peter has been plotting to usurp his position as foreign secretary, that Peter seeks to direct his campaign as leader, that Peter wishes to be the arbiter and controlling figure in a government under David. At this point, David does not want Peter to run his campaign but involved. Does Peter know this? No. David is wary of a deal with the Lib-Dems and understands his perilous position in the event he were to become leader as the second unelected PM in a row. Upon reflection, it may be that a Labour-Lib-Dem alliance would not be the harbinger of a grand progressive coalition, but an illusion under these circumstances. If an arrangement were to be made the government would be extraordinarily unstable. Because it would be subject to the demands of every bit player, the government would have the potential of collapsing over every issue large or small. It could not last long. Under the stress, the result might be that in an inevitable election to be held six to eighteen months (at the outside) from now, the Conservatives would be posed to gain the majority just beyond their grasp. Shaun advised David to work things out with his brother Ed, trying to persuade him not to compete against him. If Ed runs for leader against David, Ed Balls, Gordon's heir in the same sense that David is Tony's, might get through, which would put Labour back at square one, bearing the burden of Gordon again.

Meanwhile, Peter negotiates with the LD team, a meeting that has broken up by this afternoon. Meanwhile, the Scottish National Party, which two days ago was eager to lead the way to a coalition with Labour, the LDs, and other parties, has announced it has dropped out of any arrangment, which also means the Welsh national party, its partner, has dropped out. Meanwhile, David Blunkett, former Labour home secretary, has denounced any deal with the LDs. Meanwhile, some prominent LDs have denounced a Labour-LD coalition as a "coalition of the defeated" and a deal with the Tories as "the only game in town." Meanwhile, Clegg met privately with Cameron this morning while Peter, et al were meeting with the LD negotiators. Meanwhile, this afternoon, Cameron has upped his offer to the LDs on a referendum, insisting today is "decision time." Meanwhile, the Tory right denounces any deal with the LDs. Meanwhile, Clegg dithers.

It has been said of the Lib-Dem Party that anytime anyone tries to use it, it simply crumbles in their hands. So far, so good. I suspect for the party that allies with the LDs, the deal will be a poisoned chalice.

Re: British election

First and most important: Do NOT, repeat, NOT, call any prospective winner on either Election Night, May 6, or on the next day, Friday, May 7. The result will be unclear. It will not be clear, even perhaps by Friday afternoon. Today, the combined polls show Cameron and the Conservatives ahead but not winning an outright majority. The latest Guardian poll, out tomorrow, shown me by Alan Rusbridger today, has the Tories falling short of a majority of seats. Even if Cameron were to win an outright majority, Brown and Labour will attempt to make a deal with Clegg and the Liberal Democrats. Brown remains as Prime Minister unless the Tories win outright, which take a long time to determine. Labour and the Lib-Dems will almost certainly gain about 60 percent of the vote, more or less. Brown will reach out to Clegg to stay in power. The deal will be that Brown will approve a referendum on proportional representation giving the LDs much greater representationin future elections. That will spell the end forever of the Tories ever coming to power. The Tories see the election in apocalyptic terms—and they are not wrong. Brown's weakness heralds the sort of grand progressive coalition/alliance that Tony imagined but was never able to attempt between Labour and the LDs. Brown offering the referendum would be the first step toward that. In the case of the Tories falling short of an outright majority in seats, they will respond as though Brown is acting illegitimately, which he would not be by remaining as PM and dealing with Clegg. Informed people are already talking of what might begin to unfold on Friday as "Florida." The Tories, backed by the Murdoch press, will attempt to push Labour aside by force majeure—something that will not succeed under those circumstances. The Murdochs are almost literally going crazy. James Murdoch and hiw wife stormed into the offices of The Independent, not a Murdoch paper, when the paper endorsed the LDs and confronted the publisher, screaming in the middle of the newsroom. Murdoch would be a big, big loser if Cameron loses. Another possibile outcome is that the Conservatives come up just short and attempt their own deal with the DUP to cover the gap in seats. Shaun is on to this potential, has been talking to Peter Robinson.

No matter what, keep your powder dry until the result is crystal clear. Wait.

Subject: Updates on Baker and Kissinger

Good afternoon Ellen,

I wanted to give you the latest on the New START briefings for Baker and Kissinger.

Baker: I've arranged for a phone briefing for Baker with Gary Samore, Jim Miller, Mike Elliott, and Tom DAgostino tomorrow at 11:30 am. The briefing with last 30 minutes and they are prepared to answer any questions he has. Baker is fairly familiar with the main issues, having already spoken with John Kerry and others.

Kissinger: I secured a 45 minute briefing for Kissinger on the 19th (next Wednesday) from 2:30 to 3:15. If you agree, you can host it here in your office.

Let me know if you have any questions,

Simon

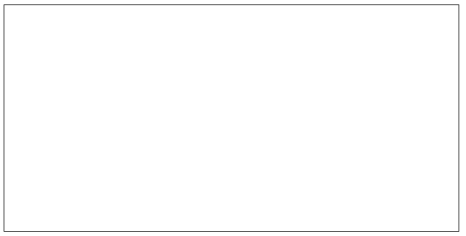
Jake, Joe,



Here is the update from IO and PRM for the Secretary (as you recall she had met with the outgoing head of UNFPA):

Eric and I would like to update you on the Secretary-General's selection process of the next head of UNFPA.

Working closely with PRM and USUN, we gathered 22 names as possible candidates from various sources, including NGOs, governments, and respected individuals in the health sector. We whittled down this list to three people who have qualifications that we believe are necessary for the job: a deep understanding of and support for UNFPA's reproductive health/family planning mission and its critical role in implementing the ICPD Program of Action, strong leadership and advocacy skills, and strong management ability to oversee an organization with over 2000 employees worldwide.

We see the leading candidates as:

USUN concurs and is in touch with the SG's office to convey our views. The SG will make his own shortlist based on a UN review panel's recommendations. He is expected to announce his selection in October to allow the designee some overlap with the incumbent, Thoraya Obaid, whose term expires at the end of the year. We will keep you apprised as the process continues.

SUKKUR (AP) - Downpours are again swelling rivers and streams in Pakistan, where some 1,500 people have died in flooding over the past two weeks.

Thousands are being evacuated as forecasters say more heavy rain could be on the way.

Pakistani officials estimate as many as 13 million people have been affected by the worst flooding in the country's 63-year history.

Pakistan's prime minister says Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton called him to offer every possible assistance, and NATO says it will help coordinate aid from partner nations.

For example when I was in Jeddah I met with a group of prominent Islamic scholars several of whom were leading Saudi doctors. We talked about ways they could reach out to their colleagues in Pakistan and Afghanistan. We should get them this information and see if we can enlist them in this effort. Walter will know how to reach them. David will advise on best way to coordinate with families.

SEOUL - The Republic of Korea said authorities from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea seized an ROK fishing boat in waters off the divided peninsula's eastern coast. ROK's coast guard said the fishermen were questioned for an alleged violation of the DPRK's exclusive economic zone. The fishing boat was then taken towards a DPRK port. The coast guard said it was not clear where exactly the fishing boat was operating when it was seized.

They said we were there to save Afghanistan's women. So how come we haven't?

BY VALERIE M. HUDSON, PATRICIA LEIDL | MAY 10, 2010

One day in November 2009, in Helmand province's capital of Lashkar Gah, a group of Afghan widows and divorcees met with Patricia, who had been commissioned to write a series of success stories for the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). All the women were in their 20s, 30s, and 40s but looked to be in their 60s. Until very recently, none of them could work because they possessed no marketable skills, could neither read nor write, and were at risk of being killed if they left their homes. A number of women said that, before the program -- which focused on tailoring and basic literacy -- their children used to weep at night from hunger.

As Patricia prepared to leave, the women fluttered around her like moths, touching her sleeves and speaking all at once. "What are they saying?" Pat asked the young Pashto-speaking interpreter. "They are telling you to go back to your country and to ask your people not to abandon them. The women of Afghanistan don't want you to leave. They will quite literally die if the Taliban return," she said.

In a recent question-and-answer period at one of our universities, Brigham Young, a student asked Gen. David Petraeus whether anyone thought to ask the women of Afghanistan how they felt about U.S. hopes to incorporate "reformed" Taliban into governance structures as the Americans leave.

Carefully avoiding the word "women," the general assured the questioning student that only "moderate" Taliban would be eligible for such rehabilitation. Left unaddressed was the definition of "moderate," which clearly depends on where you sit: If you sit in a burqa, there is no such thing as a "moderate" Taliban.

Petraeus might find it easy now to sidestep the question of what will happen to Afghanistan's women once the "moderate" Taliban come back, but it's likely to haunt him for a long time. Without the security of women there is no security -- and until we've done more to protect it, we have a moral and practical obligation to stay in Afghanistan.

In 2001, George W. Bush's administration interpreted the first post-invasion photos of Afghan girls heading to school and of Afghan women unveiling their faces as tangible evidence that conditions were improving in that benighted land. A few months after the invasion, in his 2002 State of the Union address, Bush announced, "The last time we met in this chamber, the mothers and daughters of Afghanistan were captives in their own homes, forbidden from working or going to school. Today women are free and are part of Afghanistan's new government."

The Americans strong-armed a handful of women into the loya jirga that then drafted the Afghan Constitution. They strong-armed a quota for women in the Afghan national legislature -- something that even American women are not treated to. U.S. troops built schools for girls and pushed for women to be included in the local shuras, and USAID ripped a page from Greg Mortenson's Three Cups of Tea and facilitated new training and educational opportunities for women.

But the current administration, despite its female secretary of State and its new Office of Global Women's Issues, appears to be ditching the women of Afghanistan like a blind date gone bad. You have to go back 10 months to find any sustained rhetoric from President Barack Obama about the importance of assuring the security of women in Afghanistan. Since then, and especially since last year's Afghan election, those fine words from a sitting president have all but disappeared. Many of the fine actions are gone, too. Push local shuras into including women in 2002? Yes. Push local shuras into including women in 2010? Forget it.

It's not difficult to understand why. Afghanistan is in crisis. The cynical policies that characterized the early to mid-stages of the occupation have come home to roost. President Hamid Karzai and his rogue's gallery of kleptocrats, human rights abusers, and drug lords are hanging onto power even as Karzai declares open season on the United Nations by accusing senior bureaucrats of organizing the widespread voter fraud that consolidated his own hold on power.

In the meantime, women have taken a back seat to realpolitik and the exigencies of a coalition exit strategy. But their suffering is real, as Afghanistan's poverty and chaos affect women possibly most of all. Maternal mortality in Afghanistan still makes the world's top three list, nine years after the U.S. invasion, resulting in a life expectancy for women of 46. In the countryside, Taliban zealots spray acid into girls' faces for going to school -- and only 27 percent of them do so in the first place. According to a recent survey by the U.N. Development Fund for Women, 87 percent of Afghan women report being beaten on a regular basis.

In July of last year, the U.N. Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) issued a report that represents the most stinging official condemnation of the Karzai administration's abysmal track record on women to date. The report concluded, "The current reality is that ... women are denied their most fundamental human rights and risk further violence in the course of seeking justice for crimes perpetrated against them." Last year Karzai pardoned well-connected political thugs who -- before witnesses -- gang-raped a woman with a bayonet. Her husband, who had battled for redress, was assassinated soon thereafter. Women who dare to speak out against the widespread trampling of their rights face almost certain death while their murderers face 100 percent impunity.

For the warlords and mujahideen that make up the upper echelons of the Karzai government, the issue of gender equality was always an unwanted appendage to U.S. involvement -- but one that could easily be dispensed with through the deployment of flowery speeches and the token appointment of a lone female minister to the Ministry of Women's Affairs. Indeed, just before his recent "election," Karzai felt secure enough to sign into law a series of repressive measures designed to repeal what minimal gains women have made since the Taliban ouster.

Although eventually forced to back down over legislation that allows Shiite husbands to rape their wives, Karzai successfully signed into law other legislation that denies or severely limits women's rights to inherit, divorce, or have guardianship of their own children. The Shiite Personal Status Law also legalizes forced marriage and the rape of minors. It allows men to exert almost total control over female relatives and offers them the power to prohibit women's access to work, education, and health care by denying them the right to leave their homes except for "legitimate" purposes. Even Karzai's own wife -- a doctor whose skills are desperately needed -- is strictly sequestered. And if this sounds bad, just wait until the Americans leave.

This is not just about women. Gender inequality not only affects girls and women, but boys and men. In Afghanistan, because women are rarely able to leave the house, very young boys are often forced to carry an unwarranted amount of financial responsibility, something that limits their prospects as well.

Nor is it even just about Afghanistan. As Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in March, "The subjugation of women is a threat to the national security of the United States." On a geopolitical level, Valerie's research has found that states with higher levels of violence against women are also less peaceful internationally. Indeed, violence against women is a better predictor of bellicosity than level of democracy, level of wealth, or presence of Islamic civilization. In a 2010 study, Valerie, along with Brad Thayer, also found high levels of gender inequality to be a strong aggravating factor in the development of Islamic suicide terrorism.

So, given the desperate need of Afghanistan's women and the serious consequences worldwide, why aren't we doing more to help? One reason is the fallacious notion, common among coalition members, that Afghan "culture" does not allow for gender equality and that forcing the issue will undermine Western interests. Pat heard this openly from one coalition representative, who prefers to remain anonymous: "There is no point in pushing gender equality. It will only alienate them [Afghans]." Of course, "them" here refers only to men.

But decision-makers forget that culture is not fixed, but is highly mutable and dynamic. More than 30 years ago, Afghan women were attending universities, teaching, working as doctors, nurses, and professors. Far from being a black hole of gender apartheid, Afghanistan, though impoverished, was more progressive than many of its Muslim neighbors. Furthermore, many young Afghans are open to new ways of doing things. In 2009, hundreds of Afghan men and women bravely stood together in Kabul to protest Karzai's support for a new and oppressive Shiite family law. If Americans assume that all Afghan men are Neanderthals incapable of sympathizing with the plight of their sisters, they are wrong.

Another, more unmentionable reason may be the chauvinism that permeates Western military culture. U.S. military life, despite increasing female recruitment and even "female engagement teams," remains a bastion of masculinity, with little sensitivity toward questions of female rights. For military leadership and recruits alike, immured as they are in an almost exclusively male world, the complete absence of women from Afghanistan's streets and villages elicited no comment from the Marines who surrounded Pat, though she as a woman noticed it immediately.

And the ready availability of pornography on U.S. bases, coupled with seamier depictions of life in the West, not only damages prospects for gender equality but by extension, Western interests. As one young, well-educated 24-year-old Afghan male pointed out, "Your culture has no respect for women at all. Look at your pornography and the way you exploit women in ways that we can't even imagine. Do you call that progress?" Added another Afghan USAID programmer working in Gardez, a man in his 50s who is the father of three girls, "It would be better for the coalition if they could figure out a way to limit this kind of material."

We can do better -- much better.

The Obama administration must instill in all military personnel and senior diplomats the necessity of fully protecting women's rights. Key to that is educating them about how gender equality furthers Western interests and security.

The military should spend less time courting "moderate" Taliban and more time showing Afghan community leaders how gender equality -- including female access to family planning methods -- will result in healthier families, lower maternal and child death rates, poverty alleviation, and greater self-determination. Gender should be included as a component in all governance training and should be placed front and center in the upcoming "peace jirga" that will include the Taliban. Indeed, let half of the negotiating team representing the government and the coalition be female: yes, a full 50 percent.

Women must also be represented in the government. As Melanne Verveer, U.S. ambassador at large for global women's issues, noted last summer, speaking of female politicians in Afghanistan, "There is only one minister in the cabinet, and she is powerless. There is a low percentage of women in the civil service. There is only one female governor, in Bamiyan." Obama must insist on important changes for women before we leave and make subsequent aid contingent upon maintenance of a strong presence for women in the Afghan government.

Better yet, the coalition needs to support "regime change" through the building of democratic institutions that will groom a moderate, educated middle class of young women and men to eventually take over. Over two-thirds of the Afghan population is under the age of 25, which is either a real opportunity for social change -- if they are educated and given a chance to shape their society in a progressive way -- or a major obstacle, if they find themselves without jobs, unable to marry, and burdened with retrograde attitudes of what it means to be male and female.

We must hold Afghanistan responsible for its treaty obligations under the U.N. Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and U.N. Security Council Resolution 1325 on women, peace, and security. Afghanistan signed CEDAW without reservations (the United States interestingly, has not), and that means that it has committed to passing whatever legislation is necessary to implement the wide-ranging principles of gender equality enshrined in that treaty. This includes taking measures to ensure that women enjoy the same basic human rights and fundamental freedoms as men, having in place legal and judicial procedures to protect the rights of women, taking measures to eliminate sexist discrimination, and lastly, submitting national reports every four years to a U.N. advisory group of international experts, the CEDAW Committee, to ensure transparency on what measures the country has taken to implement the treaty's provisions.

Unanimously adopted in 2000, UNSC 1325 marked the first time the Security Council recognized the disproportionate and unique impact of armed conflict on women and stressed the importance of their equal and full participation as active agents in peace and security.

Needless to say, women do not currently enjoy the same fundamental freedoms as men, and indeed, with the passing of the Shiite family law, many are worse off than they were before.

To change this, the coalition needs to stay in Afghanistan. Withdrawing at this critical juncture would doom Afghanistan and the entire region to instability and effectively consign one half of the population to premature death and an existence not fit for animals.

We are creating a shameful American tradition of leaving women no better off (Afghanistan) -- or even much worse off (Iraq) -- than before U.S. troops intervened. On the basis of America's track record, women around the world should have no faith that U.S. soldiers will improve their security. Despite Clinton's remarks on the link between gender equality and security, on the ground Americans act as if women's well-being, in the end, is not more than peripherally related to the issue of peace. As we have seen, this view could not be more wrong. Verveer's benchmarks concerning Afghanistan are the right ones: "Progress in Afghanistan must be measured not just in military terms, but also in terms of social, political, and economic participation of women in rebuilding Afghanistan and in the safeguarding of their human rights."

American women are right to ask why we are sending their sons and daughters to fight and die so that Afghan women can continue to be treated like an inferior subspecies of humanity. When you break faith with Afghan women, you break faith with American women. You also break faith with your reasons for being there in the first place.

Dear Rubens and Antonio:

I just wanted to personally congratulate you on behalf of Brazil for being the first donor to sign on and contribute to the Haiti Reconstruction Fund.

I am sorry I was in Haiti yesterday and could not attend the signing ceremony.

Brazil's $55 million contribution is truly impressive! To my knowledge, there is no precedent for any other emerging donor contributing at this level to a multilateral post-disaster or post-conflict trust fund.

I hope your example encourages other donors to follow suit.

Thank you again for all you are doing for Haiti.

Best.

Under-Skin Defibrillators Seen Closer to Reality

By BARRY MEIER

The likelihood that patients in the United States may some day receive heart defibrillators that can operate without electrical wires connected to their hearts has moved a step closer, according to a study published Wednesday.

The development of the new type of defibrillator has been long pursued by a researcher, Dr. Gust H. Bardy, at the Seattle Institute for Cardiac Research in Seattle. And in the study in The New England Journal of Medicine, Dr. Bardy and other researchers reported that initial trials of such a device in patients were successful.

Defibrillators fire an electrical jolt to interrupt a potentially fatal heart rhythm and restore normal beating. For a unit to function, a surgeon must thread an electrical sensing wire through a blood vessel into a patient's heart. The wires pose risks because they can, on rare occasion, puncture the heart during implantation or fracture while in place.

The new version delivers the electrical jolt by means of a sensor implanted under the skin near the chest bone. A power unit is placed under the skin on the side of the chest.

The new device is already for sale in some European countries, but Dr. Bardy and others cautioned that full-scale, long-term trials were still needed to prove the implant's worth to the Food and Drug Administration. Even if successful, the unit could not be used by all patients who needed a defibrillator, but several researchers said they were excited by the new study nonetheless.

Dr. Douglas P. Zipes, a professor at the Indiana University School of Medicine in Indianapolis, said the new device could someday displace existing models used in many patients Every month, about 10,000 patients in this country get a defibrillator, either for the first time or as replacements for devices whose batteries have worn out.

In recent years, the safety of defibrillator wires has come in particular focus because a model made by Medtronic has been prone to fracturing. Hundreds of patients who received the model have had to undergo new operations to replace it. Also, scar tissue often builds up around intravenous wires, a process that can make removing and replacing them difficult or dangerous.

Dr. Bardy said in a telephone interview that the deaths of several patients many years ago because of wire-related injuries were a factor in his interest in developing the new device.

"You are looking at a therapy that can avert, we hope, complications and be as effective," he said.

In the study published Wednesday, Dr. Bardy and others reported that the new device had undergone several successful initial trials, including one in which it was used for a year in about 60 patients.

The device is being developed by Cameron Health, a small company in San Clemente, Calif., that was co-founded by Dr. Bardy. Since the cardiologist began work on the project about a decade ago, the defibrillator he helped design has gone through several iterations.

The device will not be suitable for a significant number of heart patients, particularly those who require units that also include a pacemaker, which regulates a heart that is beating too fast or too slowly.

But Dr. Bardy estimated that the device could work in about 25 percent of patients who now get a defibrillator. These are largely patients at risk, because of genetic factors or certain types of heart diseases, for a type of erratic cardiac rhythm that can cause sudden death. Dr. Bardy said the cost of the new device is about the same as a standard defibrillator. However, he said it could help reduce health care costs, because implanting it is much simpler.

Before the device can be sold here, Cameron Health will have to submit more extensive human trial data to the F.D.A.. Dr. Bardy said a larger study of the device has just begun in this country and overseas and that it will most likely take a year or more to assemble data from it for the agency's review.

America and Iran: Strikes, Sanctions and Scapegoats

For the pundits, there are only two questions about U.S.-Iran relations that are of any importance: (1) Will Israel and/or the United States attack Iran? and (2) will the new sanctions have enough bite to persuade Iran to change its nuclear policy? Despite all the printers ink spilled on these two issues, the answers are an easy no and no. Neither the United States nor Israel will take the military option off the table, thereby giving the pundits (and the crowd that is dying to repeat Iraq) latitude to keep the distant prospect of military action on the front pages, where it has been for years. As a lede, it sells columns and newspapers, so it will not go away. But as analysis it is either blinded by the momentary hype or else is simple wish fulfillment.

Uber-neocon John Bolton had it right. If any such attack were to occur, it would have been at the end of the Bush administration when there was nothing left to lose. Bolton thought it was so inevitable that he predicted it unequivocally in a Wall Street Journal column in 2008. Dick Cheney apparently agreed, judging from his subsequent statements of regret. So it is fair to say that George W. Bush, after looking the potential consequences, resisted the advice of his neocon advisers, his previously dominant vice president, and the reported direct request from the government of Israel — and rejected a strike. What is the likelihood that Barack Obama, with the same catastrophic scenario before him, will approve? Forget it.

Sanctions do not persuade dictatorial regimes to abandon projects that they think are central to their security and survival or even their self-image. Just look at Saddam Hussein. The international sanctions imposed on Iraq in the 1980s make the current Iran sanctions appear anemic in comparison. Every item that went in and out of Iraq was subject to approval by a UN committee dominated by a vindictive United States. Yet, although Iraq had abandoned its nuclear weapons program years earlier, Saddam could not bring himself to let his own people and his enemies know that. Instead he was prepared to gamble that the United States would not attack him.

One of the reasons for this bad bet was that he and his cronies were doing so well under the sanctions that there was no immediate necessity to come clean. They, after all, controlled the smuggling routes. And their henchmen managed the thriving and enormously lucrative black market. As for concern with their own people, a rotund Tariq Aziz, sitting with a fine Scotch and a Cuban cigar, informed a worried UN representative that it would be good for the Iraqi people to lose some weight. An Iraqi friend of mine told me at the time that the sanctions had made criminals of the entire Iraqi middle class, which had to resort to illegal behavior in order to survive. The biggest – and most successful – of this new criminal class was the privileged group immediately around Saddam Hussein.

Which brings us to Iran. The sanctions are more effective than many anticipated. They have built a web of financial restrictions and limitations around the already weak Iranian economy that is certain to cause significant problems for the leadership. Iran's critical energy sector is particularly vulnerable. It is in a pincer. Because of cheap energy prices inside the country, artificially propped up by massive subsidies, energy demand is soaring. This siphons off a lot of Iran's oil production, which would otherwise be sold on the world market for hard currency.

At the same time, because Iran's oil fields are old and complex, they require modern technology to maintain production. That technology – and the capital investment that can only be provided by the major international oil companies – has been absent for many years. It was driven away partly by the sanctions, ironically assisted by Iran's own short-sighted negotiating tactics that offered only the most meager profit margins to outside investors. As a result, Iran's oil production is in decline at the same time that more and more of it is being soaked up by domestic consumption. In a period of relatively low oil prices, this means that Iran's hard currency earnings are drying up at an alarming rate.

This unenviable economic situation is compounded by what has to be described as perhaps the least competent economic management team of any major country in the world. Ayatollah Khamene`i, the Supreme Leader, seems totally preoccupied with bolstering his own shaky political legitimacy by pandering to the Revolutionary Guards who surround and protect him. The result is corruption on a scale beyond anything the shah's regime could have imagined.

President Ahmadinejad, also a creature of the Revolutionary Guards, is free to indulge his taste for outlandish and irresponsible rhetoric. His words keep the international and domestic spotlight glued to him; but the effect drives away prospective investors and facilitates the U.S. drive to enlist international support for sanctions against Iran. An American Jewish leader once joked with me that he suspected Ahmadinejad was a Mossad agent: no one, he observed, had been more helpful in promoting donations to Israel and Israeli causes. At the same time, under his leadership Iran has inflation and unemployment that are both in double digits.

But to be fair, Ahmadinejad is the first politician in modern Iranian history willing to address the "third rail" of Iranian politics – the immensely costly subsidies on food and energy. His initial efforts to reduce the amount of subsidized gasoline that Iranians could use met with outbursts of indignation, including torching filling stations. But these rules now seem to be grudgingly accepted and have eased slightly Iran's energy dilemma. He is now addressing the low tax rates assessed against merchants. This has also resulted in outrage, including closing the bazaars in Iran and other major cities. But his campaign seems to be making progress.

These are needed reforms that would be recommended by any responsible economic overseer, including the International Monetary Fund. Ahmadinejad attempts to balance his daring assaults on the entrenched economic interests by his belligerent rhetoric, always casting himself as the champion of the little guy. In that he resembles his populist predecessors, from Juan Peron to Huey Long to Hugo Chavez. Ahmadinejad takes on America and Israel the way Governor Long took on Standard Oil. But like other populists, Ahmadinejad is the prisoner of his own eccentric view of the world and his loyalty to lieutenants who may or may not be worthy of his faith in them.

The key question about Iran today is not whether it will be attacked or collapse under sanctions. It is whether Iran is capable under its present leadership to take a sober decision about how to deal with the outside world. The Revolutionary Guards have established a dominant position in Iran's military, its economy, and its politics. Iran increasingly comes to resemble the corporatist states of southern and eastern Europe in the 1920s and '30s that we call fascist. Iran is conducting an interior battle with its own demons, from the millenarians on the far right who choose to believe that Khamene`i is the personal representative of God on earth, to the pragmatic conservatives who simply want a more responsible leadership, to the reformists of the Green movement whose objective is to put the "republic" back into the Islamic Republic by giving the people a greater voice.

This is a yeasty and unpredictable mix. No one knows what is going to happen next.

And this is the reality that the Obama administration must deal with. The danger is not that the administration will back the wrong horse in Iran. The real danger is that the Obama administration will be so preoccupied with domestic American politics and its constant demand to look tough when dealing with Iran that it will inadvertently rescue this cruel but hapless regime from its own ineptitude by providing a convenient scapegoat for everything that goes wrong in Iran.

Here is what PJ said on the subject:

The Secretary this morning spoke with Turkish Foreign Minister Davutoglu regarding Iran. During the call, the Secretary stressed that, in our view, Iran's recent diplomacy was an attempt to stop Security Council action without actually taking steps to address international concerns about its nuclear program. There's nothing new and nothing encouraging in Iran's recent statements. It has failed to demonstrate good faith and build confidence with the international community, which was the original intent of the Tehran research reactor proposal. It has yet to formally respond to the IAEA. She stressed that the burden is with Iran and its lack of seriousness about engagement requires us to intensify efforts to apply greater pressure on Iran. That was the primary purpose of the conversation. They briefly touched on other subjects, including Middle East peace and the relationship between Turkey and Azerbaijan.

Hi Cheryl,

The U.S.-China dialogue on Latin American issues began in 2006 during the Bush administration, led by Tom Shannon, and recurred in 2007 and 2008. My trip to China will be the first such dialogue to take place during the Obama administration [redacted] B5 China is now a top-three trading partner of many Latin American countries and is in fact the number one trading partner of Brazil, as well as being a donor member of the Inter-American Development Bank and observer at the Organization of American States.

The purpose of these talks is three-fold: to inform the Chinese of our policy priorities in the Americas, to learn about their views on the region, and to explore potential areas of cooperation in the areas of economic and social development. In addition to the formal meetings with government officials, I will also be meeting with Latin American diplomats, Chinese academics and private sector groupings.

Our dialogue with China on Latin America is one of three sub-dialogues that are part of the broader U.S.-China strategic framework to ensure that the bilateral relationship is positive, cooperative, and comprehensive. The others are the China-Africa talks that AF hosted in Washington last month and the dialogue on South and Central Asia.

Best, Arturo

Subject: Iran human rights statement

One thing I forgot to mention - Bill B and Mike Posner recommend that you release the below statement. Apparently Hamidi's execution is imminent. With your approval we'll put out.

DRAFT STATEMENT BY SECRETARY CLINTON
Urging Iran to Respect the Fundamental Freedoms of its Citizens

The United States is deeply concerned that Iran continues to deny its citizens their civil rights, as well as to intimidate and detain those Iranians who seek to hold their government accountable and who stand up for the rights of their fellow citizens. We remain troubled by the case of Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani, who garnered international attention for her verdict of death by stoning. While the Iranian government later stated she would not face execution by stoning, her fate has been left unclear. We are also troubled by reports that Ebrahim Hamidi, an 18-year old charged with homosexuality, faces imminent execution despite the fact that he is currently without legal representation. Neither of their cases have proceeded with the transparency or due process enshrined in Iran's own constitution and their lawyer, Mohammad Mostafaei, felt that he had no other choice than to flee Iran after he had been questioned by authorities and his family members had been detained.

We are also concerned about the fate of Iranians who are in danger of imminent execution for exercising their right to free expression after the June 2009 elections, including Jafar Kazemi, Mohammad Haj Aghaei, and Javad Lari.

The United States urges the Iranian government to halt these executions in accordance with its international obligations to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and calls for the immediate release of all political prisoners and imprisoned human rights defenders. The United States will continue to stand with people all around the world who seek to exercise their universal rights and to speak out in defense of human liberties.

American VIP humiliated at airport

Prof. Donna Shalala, Clinton's secretary of health, arrives in Israel in order to fight academic boycott against Israel, claims she was held at Ben-Gurion Airport just because she has Arab last name

Itamar Eichner

This is not how she imagined her visit to Israel. Prof. Donna Shalala, who served as the US Secretary of Health and Human Services for eight years under Clinton and is currently the president of the University of Miami, was held for two-and-a-half hours at Ben Gurion Airport during which she underwent a humiliating security debriefing because of her Arab last name – all this despite the fact that her hosts notified the airport ahead of time that she is a VIP.

The fact that Shalala arrived in Israel as part of an official delegation of the heads of universities fighting against the academic boycott against the Jewish State also seemed not to help her.

Shalala, 69, was born in the US to Lebanese immigrant parents. She is considered a true friend of Israel and has visited the country many times in the past.

She recently arrived in Israel as a guest of the American Jewish Congress with the objective of increasing collaboration among universities in Israel, the US, and the Palestinian Authority. During their visit, members of the delegation met with President Shimon Peres, Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon, and Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad.

The official visit ended on July 12, but Shalala stayed on for another two days for a private visit.

The AJC claims that it notified the Israel Airports Authority of Shalala's VIP status as is customary prior to her departure. However, the IAA claims that it has no record on file for Shalala prior to her arrival.

When Shalala arrived at the airport, she was not recognized as a VIP and was even afforded what she claims to be "special" treatment because of her Arab last name. She claims she was held for two-and-a-half hours during which she was asked invasive and humiliating personal questions. Despite the delay, she managed to board the flight to the US. Officials who spoke with her said she was deeply offended by the treatment she received.

An IAA spokesperson reported in response: "This incident is unknown to us. We performed a thorough check. There was no contact made with us or any other body. No unusual events were registered at Ben Gurion Airport, and we have no idea about this incident, which, from our perspective, never happened."

IAA officials said that root of the problem is that the host organizations don't bother accompanying their guests to the airport.

The incident was raised Wednesday during a discussion convened by Deputy Foreign Ministry Ayalon to discuss treatment of VIPs at Ben Gurion Airport. During the discussion, it was agreed that a new protocol will be drafted that will keep incidents to a minimum.

Shalala preferred not to comment on the article.

Subject: women and reconciliation

In light of our discussion re. women and reconciliation, I wanted to alert you to a recent incident that has generated a great deal of concern among Afghan women. Two days ago, a local Taliban commander executed a pregnant widow for having an "illicit affair" (the man was not punished). While there are varying accounts of the incident, the authorities have confirmed that she was shot in the head several times after being flogged up to 200 times in Qadis district (which is completely under the control of the Taliban) of Badghis.Government authorities have condemned the incident, noting that due process was not carried out.

In meetings today, Afghan women leaders, including some who in the past accepted reconciliation as inevitable, expressed both fear and bitterness over the incident and shared concerns that such brutality against women would be far more prevalent if reconciliation occurred. They noted frustration about the lack of transparency in the government's reintegration and reconciliation processes. A number of women questioned what the government is willing to bargain in order to achieve a peace settlement and the extent to which it is prepared to roll women's rights back to appease the Taliban. They noted that women's rights are treated as a nuisance by the government leadership rather than as an important element of the peace process.

Melanne also met with President Karzai and was dismayed when he told her that there weren't any women's names on the list of potential candidates for the High Peace Council. Stanekzai is said to have come up with a list of 300 names (FRIC reports that women were on the list) that has been wittled down to about 30 names. While the list is far from being finalized, President Karzai does not currently appear to be prioritizing women's inclusion in the body--despite the fact that the APRP commits to it. Afghan women have called for 20% to 30% inclusion of women in the High Peace Council and the Joint Secretariat. We will be meeting with Stanekzai trmw and raise this issue.

Best,

Rina

Dear Cheryl:

Jean-Louis and I had a lengthy conversation today covering a broad range of subjects relating to your interest in supporting textile and apparel activity in Haiti. He has subsequently shared with me a number of specific materials on the Haiti project, including an email of yours which highlights the objectives of the project and a suggested timeline, as well as the business proposal made by Hansoll. When I digest these latter materials, I will consider myself in a much better position to make responsive recommendations to you.

As I communicated to Jean-Louis, I am happy to be helpful to you and the State Department on this project. I can make myself available a couple of days a month for meetings and pretty much on an as needed basis for phone conversations. I retain my affiliation with Warburg Pincus, the global private equity firm. This requires my presence in New York (generally) a couple of days a week. As I think you know, I am also Chairman of the Board of Campbell Soup Company. This entails three or four days a month.

Fortunately, I am not really "retired." This means that I have some flexibility in how I spend my time. You should feel free to call on me.

I retain my interest in and connections with the retail and apparel industry. While I am far from an expert on sourcing and production of apparel and textiles, I have some relevant experience and many friends who will do their best to keep me from looking foolish.

I will be in Baltimore and Washington for the next few days. Either you or Jean-Louis should feel comfortable in calling on my cell phone [redacted] In the interim, I will review these materials and speak again with Jean-Louis.

Regards,

Paul

> Aug. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said the U.S. Senate must vote to ratify a treaty with Russia to cut nuclear weapons when lawmakers return in September from their monthlong recess.
> "Our national security is at risk," Clinton said in a statement to reporters at the State Department in Washington. "It's been more than eight months since we've had inspectors on the ground in Russia" who give "a vital window into Russia's arsenal."
> The agreement, which is a priority for President Barack Obama, would replace the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty, or START, that expired in December and left the former Cold War rivals with no way to verify each other's nuclear weapons.
> Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, delayed a vote by the panel to round up more bipartisan support. The extra time may help get more Republicans on board, he said. Democrats control the Senate 59-41, with 67 votes, or two-thirds, needed for ratification.

> "When the Senate returns they must act," Clinton said today. The treaty "will advance our national security and provide stability and predictability between the world's two leading nuclear powers," she said.
> Democrats, including Kerry, say the U.S. will need to set an example of arms cuts as Obama and other top officials press their counterparts to impose more of their own sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program to complement United Nations penalties adopted earlier this year.
> Republicans including Arizona Senator Jon Kyl have balked at a treaty they say could hamstring U.S. plans for a European missile defense system that Russia opposes.

Re: Hague meeting

On your meeting on Friday, May 14, with new British Foreign Secretary William Hague you might explore a number of issues below. (I've discussed with Shaun.)

Northern Ireland. Cameron has pledged to reduce public sector spending in NI. But the impact of public sector spending there is not the same as in other parts of the UK because of 40 years of troubles. Political stability depends upon economic stability. Removing funding specifically threatens community policing, creating a vacuum that the Real IRA and other men of violence would rush into. Cutting the public sector would make it difficult to increase private sector investment. Does the new government understand the US interest in NI and appreciate the fragility of the situation?

Defense and Foreign Policy Cuts. The new government program is to slash the deficit, cutting deeply into government programs. This really cannot be done without defense and foreign policy reductions. Seek claficiation on exactly whether and where these cuts be made. Will they affect Afghanistan policy and over what schedule? How will cuts in the foreign service affect British influence in other areas?

Trident and Nuclear Deterrent. The coalition agreement between the Conservative and Liberal Democrats allows the LDs to abstain in parliamentary votes on four issues that will apparently let the Tories have their way: marriage tax allowances; nuclear power; college tuition fees; and Trident and the nuclear deterrent. During the campaign, the LDs ran on eliminating the Trident and erasing the UK nuclear deterrent. How will this actually work in practice?

Political Changes. The new government, because the coalition is fundamentally at odds with itself, has proposed to pass a parliamentary bill that establishes a five year term for a government and furthermore establishes that a vote of no confidence can only be passed on a 55 percent vote. You might just seek Hague's view on how this will work.

VIENNA - (AP) Iran has set up new equipment that will allow it to boost its efficiency at enriching uranium at higher levels, diplomats said May 14. The move is likely to give the U.S. more leverage with Russia and China in its push for new UN sanctions on Tehran. Iran's clandestine enrichment activities were discovered eight years ago and have expanded since to encompass thousands of centrifuges churning out material enriched to 3.5 percent. But despite three sets of Security Council sanctions meant to enforce demands of a freeze, Tehran moved to a new level in February, when it set up a small program to produce material enriched to near 20 percent.

Thanks for the chat yesterday, Hillary. With Martin's and Bruce Jones's help, I'm working on that one. Will get back to you.

On a very different matter—and that's why I'm cc'ing Cheryl and Jake—at some point when it's appropriate and convenient, I'd welcome a chance to give you—either directly or indirectly via C and/or J—a strongly held (and widely shared) view about the issue of UN leadership and the timetable therefore. Zero rush.

Hope it's a genuine weekend for you (whatever that means, grading on curve).

Attached is the very latest version of the testimony for Tuesday's hearing, which tries to incorporate (and de-conflict) everyone's terrific edits and suggestions consistent with our need to keep this tight and accessible. Especially as there's some new language contained herein, I wanted to shoot this around one last time before we send it to S. If anyone has any serious reaction to anything contained herein, please flag by 3:00 pm today. The speechwriters are also going to review, especially in an attempt to streamline. (The current draft stands at 1583 words.) Finally, I'll give it one more read-through before we send it along.

Thanks again for everyone's great work on this!

Subject: Draft S. Testimony for START Hearing

S., D/S, P, T, VCI, EUR, and S/P colleagues,

Attached is a draft of S.'s testimony for next Tuesday's SFRC hearing on the New START Treaty. Please let us know if you have any proposed edits and suggestions as soon as possible, and no later than 2:00 pm tomorrow (Friday). As you review this draft, a few reminders:

- The testimony should be around 5-8 minutes, and ideally on the lower end of that spectrum, so suggestions that are word-count-neutral (or suggestions stripping or streamlining verbiage) are much preferred.

- Unlike previous remarks, this is a public hearing and the testimony will be publicly available. I tried to strip out language from previous remarks accordingly, and I have one question embedded therein on one particular clause.

- While these remarks are drafted to be slightly more formal (as compared to the All Senators Brief), they still should be as accessible as possible, esp. given the lack of extensive substantive expertise by many of our SFRC Senators.

- Please return edits on a bureau-wide basis.

H, T, and VCI are also coordinating on a full briefing binder that we plan to deliver to S. by COB tomorrow. We can certainly shoot that around to anyone who would like a pdf copy.

Thanks,
Dave

Winners and Losers

By ROGER COHEN

NEW YORK — The Clintons threw a big Washington bash on June 30 for Hillary Clinton's longtime aide, Huma Abedin, and what struck one of the many guests was the absence of anyone from President Obama's tight White House inner circle.

Congressional heavyweights thronged the garden of the Clinton spread on Embassy Row, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. The city's big powerbrokers and various State Department honchos were there for a party marking Abedin's marriage to Congressman Anthony Weiner of New York. But White House insiders stayed away.

Well, as Bill Clinton told CNN recently, "I did everything I could to defeat President Obama and I wanted Hillary to win" — old wounds do not heal overnight. Indeed, they may not heal at all. When my informant said something about the old grievances not going away, the response from the hosts went something like this:

No, they don't and they never will. But, we're public servants and suckers for punishment, so we soldier on.

Speaking of soldiering on, Mrs. Clinton left for Europe the next day and while Americans celebrated July 4, she was in Armenia trying to sort out the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute and — equally thankless task — mediate between Armenia and Turkey on their disagreement over what happened in 1915.

You've got to salute Hillary. She's got guts to go with that razor-sharp mind. It's a heck of a job being secretary of state when the White House puts a tight collar around the big issues — Afghanistan, Iran, Israel-Palestine and Iraq — and you're left with Nagorno-Karabakh, disputed Ottoman crimes of World War I and, if you're lucky, U.S. bases on Okinawa.

The situation might be slightly less troubling if the boys in the White House — and they are overwhelmingly boys — were foreign-policy heavyweights. They're not. Indeed, I'm told Henry Kissinger refers to them as "the kids."

Chief among them, according to my colleague Helene Cooper, is Denis McDonough, the National Security Council's chief of staff. Earlier this month, Cooper wrote: "Forget Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton or Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates. When it comes to national security, Mr. Obama's inner circle is so tight it largely consists of Mr. McDonough, a 40-year-old from Minnesota who is unknown to most Americans."

I do know McDonough and I've spent a fair amount of time in Minnesota. He has many of the state's qualities: positive, brisk, can-do, affable and efficient.

But am I reassured when I read that Obama's national-security inner circle is comprised of him? Nope. He was a great guy to control the foreign-policy side of a campaign — as he did to perfection for Obama — but he's not a great guy to think big about the world.

Thinking big and bold is required right now. The clock is ticking on momentous presidential decisions. Among them are an Afghan extrication that will salvage a minimum of core U.S. security interests — which will require a bruising negotiation with the Taliban — and what to do about Iran when it becomes apparent by the end of this year that the latest sanctions have changed nothing. Obama's apparent carte blanche to Israel this month on Iran was disturbing.

Then there's Israel-Palestine, where Obama can't decide whether the cost of being an honest broker — pressure on both sides — is worth the domestic heat he takes for being critical of Israel, with the result that he's zigzagging to little effect.

After firing Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal, Obama said he would tolerate debate but not division. My sense is his foreign-policy house is divided — and the weaker for it. Gen. James Jones, his national security adviser, speaks fine French — the French love that — but he's left most people unconvinced. Tom Donilon, Jones' deputy, dances around the vacuum as best he can. Like McDonough, David Axelrod and Rahm Emanuel were brilliant campaign strategists, but should they be foreign-policy strategists?

In Clinton, Obama has a Baker-class secretary of state. For how much longer is he going to delegate her to Nagorno-Karabakh? The State Department, a repository of other underused talent, cannot be the White House annex for non-critical affairs.

Back in the 1860s, James Gordon Bennett, then the editor of the New York Herald, a forebear of the International Herald Tribune, gave these instructions to an intrepid foreign correspondent named Henry Morton Stanley:

"Draw a thousand pounds now; and when you have gone through that, draw another thousand, and when that is spent, draw another thousand, and when you have finished that, draw another thousand, and so on; but, FIND LIVINGSTONE."

He was referring to the lost African explorer, David Livingstone, whom Stanley eventually tracked down on Lake Tanganyika, uttering the immortal words: "Doctor Livingstone, I presume?"

That sort of journalism's gone out of fashion. So we can all thank Rolling Stone for opening its pocketbook and telling Michael Hastings to do whatever it took to find General McChrystal. In his brilliant piece, Hastings did that. He also found something else: an Afghan policy as fragmented as the team Obama running it.

McChrystal's gone, but not the dysfunction. A blow-up, I presume? Watch this space.

In 2001, PM boasted of manipulating Oslo accords

BY LIEL LEIBOVITZ | Jul 15, 2010 4:03 PM |

Meeting with Benjamin Netanyahu last week, President Obama could not have been more effusive. "I believe Prime Minister Netanyahu wants peace," Obama said. "I believe he is ready to take risks for peace."

A newly revealed tape of Netanyahu in 2001, being interviewed while he thinks the cameras are off, shows him in a radically different light. In it, Netanyahu dismisses American foreign policy as easy to maneuver, boasts of having derailed the Oslo accords with political trickery, and suggests that the only way to deal with the Palestinians is to "beat them up, not once but repeatedly, beat them up so it hurts so badly, until it's unbearable" (all translations are mine).

According to Haaretz's Gideon Levy, the video should be "Banned for viewing by children so as not to corrupt them, and distributed around the country and the world so that everyone will know who leads the government of Israel."

Netanyahu is speaking to a small group of terror victims in the West Bank settlement of Ofra two years after stepping down as prime minister in 1999. He appears laid-back. After claiming that the only way to deal with the Palestinian Authority was a large-scale attack, Netanyahu was asked by one of the participants whether or not the United States would let such an attack come to fruition.

"I know what America is," Netanyahu replied. "America is a thing you can move very easily, move it in the right direction. They won't get in their way." He then called former president Bill Clinton "radically pro-Palestinian," and went on to belittle the Oslo peace accords as vulnerable to manipulation. Since the accords state that Israel would be allowed to hang on to pre-defined military zones in the West Bank, Netanyahu told his hosts that he could torpedo the accords by defining vast swaths of land as just that.

"They asked me before the election if I'd honor [the Oslo accords]," Netanyahu said. "I said I would, but ... I'm going to interpret the accords in such a way that would allow me to put an end to this galloping forward to the '67 borders. How did we do it? Nobody said what defined military zones were. Defined military zones are security zones; as far as I'm concerned, the entire Jordan Valley is a defined military zone. Go argue."

Smiling, Netanyahu then recalled how he forced former U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher to agree to let Israel alone determine which parts of the West Bank were to be defined as military zones. "They didn't want to give me that letter," Netanyahu said, "so I didn't give them the Hebron agreement [the agreement giving Hebron back to the Palestinians]. I cut the cabinet meeting short and said, 'I'm not signing.' Only when the letter came, during that meeting, to me and to Arafat, did I ratify the Hebron agreement. Why is this important? Because from that moment on, I de facto put an end to the Oslo accords."

President Obama, and anyone else concerned about Israel's commitment to the peace process, may watch the tape online here.

Angst about USAID's fate grows as development reviews stall

Posted: 15 Jul 2010 06:30 AM PDT

The development community is up in arms about the persistent delays in the administration's two major reviews o development policy, as internal disagreements continue to plague the ongoing efforts to reconcile America's development and foreign-policy goals.

The administration's two major development reviews, the White House's Presidential Study Directive on Global Development (PSD-7) and the State Department's Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) are both missing in action as the administration crosses the 18-month mark. The interim report of the QDDR was never released and there's concern the final document might not be ready by the stated September deadline.

The PSD, a draft version of which was first published on The Cable, is being held up by a continuing and mounting disagreement between the White House and the State Department over how to divide power over development between Foggy Bottom and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID).

According to administration sources and development-community leaders, the dispute between the National Security Council and the office of the Secretary of State Hillary Clinton came to a head at a principals' meeting in late June, when a near-final version of the PSD was discussed. Clinton, our sources report, refused to sign off on th PSD because she disagreed with that document's determination that USAID should be the lead agency in charge of individual development missions in the field.

Multiple issues are still in dispute between State and the NSC concerning the reviews, including the role of USAID Administrator Rajiv Shah and what level of autonomy USAID will be granted in determining its own policies, budgets, and priorities. Shah has been rebuilding USAID's intellectual capacity, but the aid community fears th Clinton intends to consolidate real power inside her office despite her promise to "elevate" and "integrate" development as the third pillar of national security alongside diplomacy and defense.

Many believe that the White House launched a not-so-subtle salvo at Clinton by releasing a statement on development at the G-8, just days after the contentious principals' meeting, that closely tracks what's known about the PSD and declaring it as U.S. policy before the internal negotiations with State were completed.

Leading development community-voices are now openly venting their frustration with the delays in the process.

"Eighteen months into the administration, the federal government remains abysmally organized to address Haiti, Pakistan and other development challenges," wrote Nancy Birdsall, the president of the Center for Global Development, on the organization's website Thursday. "When it comes to global development, I'd give President Obama and his top advisors an A for strategic vision and a big fat F for failure to get on with it."

In an open letter to Clinton, National Security Advisor Jim Jones, and National Economic Council chairman Larry Summers, Birdsall raised several issues that resonate with development advocates. She called the Millennium Challenge Corporation "pathetically underfunded," lamented that no one seems to know who's in charge of big initiatives on food security and global health, and complained that USAID still has vacancies for several senior staff positions.

Birdsall's calls for giving USAID total independence and cabinet-level status aren't likely to be final recommendations from either the White House or the State Department.

But her overall anxiety about USAID's status is widely shared in the development community. A team of top development leaders including former USAID administrator Brian Atwood wrote today to protest the cuts in the foreign aid budget that Congress is calling for.

"We are grateful for the emphasis the President has placed on development and foreign assistance -- a tradition he continues from President Bush. And we strongly support Secretary Clinton's call to make USAID 'the premier development agency in the world,' they wrote. "But this goal will only be achieved when USAID's personnel capacit is rebuilt and its funding enhanced."

World Food Prize Laureate Rev. David Beckmann, who co-chairs the Modernizing Foreign Assistance Network (MFAN), told The Cable, "The Obama administration is doing smart and creative things to help hungry and poor people around the world. But they are hung up by organizational confusion, and the president needs to make it clea that USAID, not the State Department, has lead responsibility for development."

MFAN even has a running counter on its website tracking the days since President Obama pledged to release his overall development policy.

Adding to the concern is the fact that two of the lead officials who are in charge of the QDDR will be departing the State Department soon. Deputy Secretary of State Jack Lew has been tapped to become the next director of the White House's Office of Management and Budget. Policy Planning chief Anne Marie Slaughter has made it known that her two-year leave from Princeton will require her to return to New Jersey at the end of the year.

State Department officials assure The Cable that the QDDR will be completed before Lew and Slaughter leave Fogg Bottom. Nevertheless, the delays are having an own effect of their own, said Birdsall.

"Time is not on our side," she told The Cable in an interview. "We're missing in action as a country."

And pasted below is the exchange between Corker and Holbrooke:

CORKER:

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

I want to thank the ambassador for coming. I know he has a wealth of knowledge and certainly served our country for many years.

A number of us wrote a letter to you asking for this hearing, and my guess is you might have had hearings any way. But the reason we wrote the letter -- bipartisan letter -- was to provide Congress and the American people with a definition of the end state for our civilian operations in Afghanistan, clear objectives for the civilian mission, and a detailed plan for achieving those objectives, and the very specific, measurable metrics being used to measure progress towards achieving those objectives.

I have to say, I've been here for an hour and 10 minutes. I have heard nothing -- nothing -- about that. And while I respect the ambassador, I've heard a lot of process. I've heard a lot about meetings. I have no earthly idea -- no earthly idea what our objectives are on the civilian front.

And I don't know if you have time to begin doing that right now, but this has so far been an incredible waste of time, from the standpoint of -- of hearing, though.

And I have tremendous respect for you, but maybe we have the wrong witness. I hope we'll have maybe Secretary Clinton and Eikenberry, maybe Crocker. I know he's supposed to come.

But could you answer the question that was the purpose of these hearings in the first place?

HOLBROOKE:

I'm sorry. You don't feel that I've told you what our civilian programs are?

CORKER:

You've told me a lot of process. I'd like to know a definition of what our end state is for civilian operations, the very question we asked when we set this hearing up, is in Afghanistan, clear objectives for the -- for the -- detailed plan for achieving those. I'd like to hear you talk about that.

I mean, I'm glad we have a lot of interagency folks here, but I'm not hearing anything that talks about where we're going.

I'd also like to know how the withdrawal date that's been set affects that and how it affects those we're working with in the country.

HOLBROOKE:

First of all, Senator Corker, I believe I have discussed our civilian programs in very considerable detail within the constraints of time, but we did prepare a report for this committee earlier this year, which was entered into the record and which I will be happy to enter into the record again, if you wish. And you can go through every one of the programs.

The reason I brought my colleagues with me was to show that this was a whole-of-government, an unprecedented effort.

Now, on the specifics, since you want specifics, Afghanistan is an agricultural country. It exported agricultural products until 1978 and the Soviet invasion. We are trying to rebuild it. This was not being done for the first seven years of this war.

We have -- your -- your committee has given us a great deal of money for agriculture. And we are spending it wisely in a joint AID- USDA effort, which Senator Lugar has particularly been involved in, food, seeds, cash-for-work programs, encouraging alternatives to opium production.

HOLBROOKE:

Secondly, rule of law. We are spending -- we are spending the money you have authorized for us to create a justice system which can cut into the Taliban's propaganda about corruption and lack of a justice system.

Third, counter-narcotics. We have ended poppy eradication, a radical change, because all we were doing by eradicating poppy seeds, poppy crops, was driving farmers, poor farmers, into the hands of the Taliban.

Fourth, a major program of subnational governance, where we are putting aid directly to the district level.

Fifth, a major effort in specific areas, some of which were alluded to earlier, such as electricity for Kandahar. Senator Kerry asked earlier about Kandahar. One of the major issues here is to bring electricity to the people as a benefit of the international presence.

The whole range of activities we have is designed to support the country and to support General Petraeus' counter-insurgency effort. He and I -- I was his counterpart until two weeks ago when he moved to Kabul. We have worked intimately in an effort to create a joint civilian-military effort. And I am happy to provide you with every detail you wish in private briefings on behalf of me and my team.

Point number two in regard to the end state issue you raised. I want to be clear on the difference between end state and exit strategy.

If we -- this is my personal view, senator -- but if we walk away from Afghanistan, again, as we did 21 years ago, the consequences will be similarly catastrophic, because of the unique strategic position of Afghanistan and the reaction that would have in Pakistan, China, India and the country to Afghanistan's west, Iran, as well as the larger region that includes Russia, Saudi Arabia, India, and even extending to Western Europe, which is concerned about terrorism from that region, just as much as we are.

So, I hope that when we talk about end state, we talk about a sustainable end state which involves continued American economic and development assistance, and we continue to fulfill our obligations to train the police and the military. This will not be cheap. But it will be a fraction of the money that is now being authorized and appropriated for the military campaign.

When we will be able to transition to that is impossible for me or anyone to say. But it won't be on a single day. It will be a gradual process. And that is what the review in December and the president's decision-making will focus on.

CORKER:

In our foreign policy, generally speaking -- I know we've had some rough times over the last several years -- it's been something that we've been able to address in a bipartisan way. And I think that the issues that you're dealing with, that we're dealing with in Afghanistan are incredibly tough.

I still don't -- I haven't understood what the administration was saying in the beginning. That's not to be critical of them. I just don't understand. I still don't understand. I've met with you and your staff over at the State Department. It's just incredibly vague to me.

And I think what we are doing, we have partners, which include the Pakistanis and everybody around, that they don't know what we're doing. They don't know when we're leaving. They think we're leaving shortly, I think. We've just had colleagues who have come from there.

We've had a -- we've got a president there that's having to play both sides, because he wants to survive, because he doesn't know what our intentions are. The Pakistanis don't know what our intentions are, I don't think. And they're making accommodations on both sides.

So, I just have to tell you, I send letters to parents and spouses. And what I feel because of this lack of clarity is that we are in Afghanistan, because we're in Afghanistan, and that we don't have the will to be successful. And we don't have the will to leave, because of some of the things you just outlined.

But I just don't hear any clarity. And again, I want to support the administration. I want to support you, because that's what we need to do as a country, is let the shores (ph) align (ph), let the partisanship.

But I have to tell you, as a person who wants to do that, I still don't understand. OK? And I have average intelligence, so I would ask you to, please -- or maybe let's have some witnesses in here that can shed more light or be more specific. But I don't understand, and I'm very concerned.

And I think we're sending a lot of mixed signals. And I think there's a lot of dissension. Actually, as I listen to you, even within the administration itself, and that has to end.

And I just ask you, please. You have a lot of experience, help us understand. You haven't done that today. And I would ask the chairman to please have some witnesses come in and explain to us what the end state is, what we can envision Afghanistan being whenever this withdrawal does take place, because I still do not understand.

We've changed it. Now it's sort of a degraded country where they have conflict, but it's not out of control. I mean, the bar continues to change. And I'm just concerned as an individual, and yet I want us to be, if we can, all on the same page as much as possible. But I think to do that, this has got to be much clearer than has been outlined.

HOLBROOKE:

Senator, I'm sorry that my answers don't fully satisfy you. But I want to be very clear on this, because I understand your comments and I respect them.

First of all, the core question -- the one you are asked by your constituents, and I'm asked by everybody -- why are we in Afghanistan? The short, simple answer is 9/11, direct threats to our national security interests, and the fact that while our enemies against our homeland are on the Pakistani side of the border, this is a single struggle. And we have to strengthen the Afghan government and let -- and teach it to stand on its own feet over time, so that we can move forward, while we do other things that fall outside the scope of this hearing, to dismantle, deter and defeat Al Qaida.

Now, if you do not believe that it's a threat to the homeland, then we have an honest difference of opinion. But I think the Times Square bombing incident shows clearly how dangerous that situation is.

Secondly, on the civilian mission, again, it's in support of a single, civilian-military, counter-insurgency mission. And we have benchmarks, requested and required by the Congress, and submitted to you. And our overarching goal here is always the same, to disrupt, dismantle and defeat Al Qaida and prevent its ability to threaten the United States.

And we believe, all of us -- and there is no division on this in the executive branch -- that the situation we face out there is a direct threat. We believe that before the Times Square situation occurred, and I don't think anything could have proved it more vividly.

And to achieve this, we have to degrade the Taliban as well, because they are part of the enemy's structure -- a different part, but an integral part -- that we face.

Now, the Afghan government doesn't yet have the capacity to deal with this on its own. How could they after 30 years of war? And so, the civilian part of it, the things I've just mentioned to you -- police, government capacity, rule of law, subnational government, training provincial officials, women's empowerment and a whole series of other major issues -- are part of our civilian programs.

And we're happy to come back up to your office -- we appreciated your visit to us -- and continue this dialogue.

Our civilian strategy is designed from keeping Al Qaida at bay, and it's designed to help Afghan institutions establish conditions for stable governance. Our plan has these benchmarks, which have been briefed to you and your colleagues, and we're happy to discuss them in detail at any time.

He is calling to complain about Ambassador Holbrooke. He feels that Holbrooke is condescending and not forthcoming, including at this week's hearing. He also has broader concerns about the lack of a clear end state and metrics for our Afghan policy, but the main reason he wants to talk to you is about Holbrooke.

Holbrooke tried to faithfully answer his questions and frankly Corker was looking for a sound byte and he got one. We can offer him additional briefings and a readout after your upcoming trip if that would help.

You could use also this opportunity to thank him for sitting down earlier this week on the New START Treaty; to note that we received and are following up on his July 14 follow-up letter; and that we want to continue working with him to get him to a place where he can support the treaty.

And pasted below is the exchange between Corker and Holbrooke:

CORKER:
Mr. Chairman, thank you.
I want to thank the ambassador for coming. I know he has a wealth of knowledge and certainly served our country for many years.
A number of us wrote a letter to you asking for this hearing, and my guess is you might have had hearings any way. But the reason we wrote the letter -- bipartisan letter -- was to provide Congress and the American people with a definition of the end state for our civilian operations in Afghanistan, clear objectives for the civilian mission, and a detailed plan for achieving those objectives, and the very specific, measurable metrics being used to measure progress towards achieving those objectives.

I have to say, I've been here for an hour and 10 minutes. I have heard nothing -- nothing -- about that. And while I respect the ambassador, I've heard a lot of process. I've heard a lot about meetings. I have no earthly idea -- no earthly idea what our objectives are on the civilian front.

AFTER IROQUOIS LACROSSE TEAM DENIED ENTRY TO UK, GILLIBRAND ASKS SECRETARY OF STATE TO DEVELOP INTERNATIONALLY-RECOGNIZED TRAVEL DOCUMENTS FOR TRIBES AND NATIONS IN NORTH AMERICA

Gillibrand: "We Must Ensure that Native Americans Have the Same Freedom to Travel Around the World"

Washington, DC – With the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse Team missing their first world championship game in England due to the British government's refusal to recognize their Haudenosaunee Confederacy-issued passports, U.S. Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) today asked Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to work with Native American leaders and the Canadian and UK governments to develop internationally-recognized travel documents for the Iroquois nation as well as other tribes and nations in North America in order to prevent any Native American groups from being denied travel abroad in the future. Senator Gillibrand praised Secretary Clinton for clearing the way for the 23-member team to travel to the United Kingdom to participate in the Olympics of lacrosse and expressed disappointment in the outcome.

In a letter to Secretary Clinton, Senator Gillibrand wrote, "Considering the recent situation which prevented the members of the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse team and their supporters from traveling to the United Kingdom to participate in the international lacrosse tournament with the Haudenosaunee passports, and in an effort to prevent against such disappointment in the future, I therefore request that you work with Tribal governments, in concert with the Canadian government to the extent that Canada faces a similar situation, to come to an understanding with the United Kingdom and other foreign governments with the goal of establishing a document or process that would provide Native American travelers with the same freedom of movement enjoyed by all U.S. citizens."

The members of the Iroquois lacrosse team view their tribe as a sovereign nation and, like many Native Americans throughout New York, strongly and rightfully protect their own national identities and will not accept a U.S. or Canadian passport. This important recognition coupled with heightened aviation security standards after September 11th pose a challenge for the Iroquois lacrosse team, leaving them unable to leave New York and compete in England. To ensure that this does not happen again, Senator Gillibrand encouraged the U.S. and Canada to work with Native American leaders to develop a universally recognized document for all tribes and nations in North America that meet international travel standards.

Current standards for travel documents, developed by the International Civil Aviation Organization for Machine Readable Passports (MRPs), include a machine readable zone on the identity page with the name, passport number, nationality, date of birth, sex, passport expiration date and personal identity number of the passport holder.

On Wednesday, Secretary Clinton issued a one-time travel waiver and granted approval for them to re-enter the U.S., but the British government decided not to recognize the waiver and denied the team entry into the United Kingdom. The Iroquois lacrosse team defaulted on the first game and currently remains in New York ahead of tomorrow's second game.

Full text of the letter is below.

Dear Madam Secretary,

I am writing to you with regard to the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse Team's recent inability to travel to the United Kingdom on Haudenosaunee passports. Thank you for your decision to allow a one-time waiver for the team to travel on their passports and for the efforts of your staff to work with the British consulate on behalf of the team's ability to travel. I am disappointed by the decision of the United Kingdom government to deny entry visas to the team despite your decision to grant them a waiver and assurance that they would be allowed to re-enter the United States, but am also hopeful that you will continue your efforts to facilitate travel of Native Americans internationally.

As you are aware, there is a large constituency of Native Americans in New York State. The tribes strongly guard their sovereignty and rightly celebrate and protect their own national identities. Treaties between the United States and tribal governments have established their status as sovereign nations within the United States. It is understandable that they should seek to maintain their national insignia to the greatest extent possible. Although current law provides that "a person born in the United States to a member of an Indian, Eskimo, Aleutian, or other aboriginal tribe"... "shall be nationals and citizens of the United States," we should also not fail to recognize the unique status that Native Americans enjoy.

In past instances, members of the Iroquois Confederacy have been allowed to travel internationally using a Haudenosaunee travel document. I fully understand that it is the right of each country to determine what is accepted as a valid travel document for entry into their country. However, it seems to me that other countries should be more amenable to consideration of United States Government's policies that accommodate the sovereignty of Native Americans while addressing the concerns of foreign governments.

It is my understanding that the Haudenosaunee Grand Council of Chiefs is in ongoing discussion with the Department of State regarding how to improve their passport so that it would meet the higher-level international travel security requirements. Considering the recent situation which prevented the members of the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse team and their supporters from traveling to the United Kingdom to participate in the international lacrosse tournament with the Haudenosaunee passports, and in an effort to prevent against such disappointment in the future, I therefore request that you work with Tribal governments, in concert with the Canadian government to the extent that Canada faces a similar situation, to come to an understanding with the United Kingdom and other foreign governments with the goal of establishing a document or process that would provide Native American travelers with the same freedom of movement enjoyed by all U.S. citizens.

I request your assessment of whether current law would allow the development of an alternative travel document that would be recognized by other governments such as the United Kingdom, your facilitation of enhancing the Haudenosaunee passport so that it complies with standard international practices, or if necessary, the determination of whether legislation would be necessary in order to move forward on resolving this issue.

Thank you for your attention to this matter, and I look forward to working with you to address these concerns.

AFTER IROQUOIS LACROSSE TEAM DENIED ENTRY TO UK, GILLIBRAND ASKS SECRETARY OF STATE TO DEVELOP INTERNATIONALLY-RECOGNIZED TRAVEL DOCUMENTS FOR TRIBES AND NATIONS IN NORTH AMERICA

Gillibrand: "We Must Ensure that Native Americans Have the Same Freedom to Travel Around the World"

Washington, DC – With the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse Team missing their first world championship game in England due to the British government's refusal to recognize their Haudenosaunee Confederacy-issued passports, U.S. Senator

Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) today asked Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to work with Native American leaders and the Canadian and UK governments to develop internationally-recognized travel documents for the Iroquois nation as well as other tribes and nations in North America in order to prevent any Native American groups from being denied travel abroad in the future. Senator Gillibrand praised Secretary Clinton for clearing the way for the 23-member team to travel to the United Kingdom to participate in the Olympics of lacrosse and expressed disappointment in the outcome.

In a letter to Secretary Clinton, Senator Gillibrand wrote, "Considering the recent situation which prevented the members of the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse team and their supporters from traveling to the United Kingdom to participate in the international lacrosse tournament with the Haudenosaunee passports, and in an effort to prevent against such disappointment in the future, I therefore request that you work with Tribal governments, in concert with the Canadian government to the extent that Canada faces a similar situation, to come to an understanding with the United Kingdom and other foreign governments with the goal of establishing a document or process that would provide Native American travelers with the same freedom of movement enjoyed by all U.S. citizens."

The members of the Iroquois lacrosse team view their tribe as a sovereign nation and, like many Native Americans throughout New York, strongly and rightfully protect their own national identities and will not accept a U.S. or Canadian passport. This important recognition coupled with heightened aviation security standards after September 11th pose a challenge for the Iroquois lacrosse team, leaving them unable to leave New York and compete in England. To ensure that this does not happen again, Senator Gillibrand encouraged the U.S. and Canada to work with Native American leaders to develop a universally recognized document for all tribes and nations in North America that meet international travel standards.

Current standards for travel documents, developed by the International Civil Aviation Organization for Machine Readable Passports (MRPs), include a machine readable zone on the identity page with the name, passport number, nationality, date of birth, sex, passport expiration date and personal identity number of the passport holder.

On Wednesday, Secretary Clinton issued a one-time travel waiver and granted approval for them to re-enter the U.S., but the British government decided not to recognize the waiver and denied the team entry into the United Kingdom. The Iroquois lacrosse team defaulted on the first game and currently remains in New York ahead of tomorrow's second game.

Full text of the letter is below.

Dear Madam Secretary,

I am writing to you with regard to the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse Team's recent inability to travel to the United Kingdom on Haudenosaunee passports. Thank you for your decision to allow a one-time waiver for the team to travel on their passports and for the efforts of your staff to work with the British consulate on behalf of the team's ability to travel. I am disappointed by the decision of the United Kingdom government to deny entry visas to the team despite your decision to grant them a waiver and assurance that they would be allowed to re-enter the United States, but am also hopeful that you will continue your efforts to facilitate travel of Native Americans internationally.

As you are aware, there is a large constituency of Native Americans in New York State. The tribes strongly guard their sovereignty and rightly celebrate and protect their own national identities. Treaties between the United States and tribal governments have established their status as sovereign nations within the United States. It is understandable that they should seek to maintain their national insignia to the greatest extent possible. Although current law provides that "a person born in the United States to a member of an Indian, Eskimo, Aleutian, or other aboriginal tribe"..."shall be nationals and citizens of the United States," we should also not fail to recognize the unique status that Native Americans enjoy.

In past instances, members of the Iroquois Confederacy have been allowed to travel internationally using a Haudenosaunee travel document. I fully understand that it is the right of each country to determine what is accepted as a valid travel document for entry into their country. However, it seems to me that other countries should be more amenable to consideration of United States Government's policies that accommodate the sovereignty of Native Americans while addressing the concerns of foreign governments.

It is my understanding that the Haudenosaunee Grand Council of Chiefs is in ongoing discussion with the Department of State regarding how to improve their passport so that it would meet the higher-level international travel security requirements. Considering the recent situation which prevented the members of the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse team and their supporters from traveling to the United Kingdom to participate in the international lacrosse tournament with the Haudenosaunee passports, and in an effort to prevent against such disappointment in the future, I therefore request that you work with Tribal governments, in concert with the Canadian government to the extent that Canada faces a similar situation, to come to an understanding with the United Kingdom and other foreign governments with the goal of establishing a document or process that would provide Native American travelers with the same freedom of movement enjoyed by all U.S. citizens.

I request your assessment of whether current law would allow the development of an alternative travel document that would be recognized by other governments such as the United Kingdom, your facilitation of enhancing the Haudenosaunee passport so that it complies with standard international practices, or if necessary, the determination of whether legislation would be necessary in order to move forward on resolving this issue.

Thank you for your attention to this matter, and I look forward to working with you to address these concerns.

Dear Melanne and Saba,

I've attached the notes from our meeting with Karzai; they may be helpful in preparing for next week.

On the positive side, he committed to including women in any formal negotiations with the Taliban. Hopefully we can nail that down firmly -- it would be both a good safeguard and a signal to the Taliban of the kind of Afghanistan they will be joining if they do indeed ever want to join it.

Beyond that, he was in "women's lives first, women's rights second" mode -- speaking passionately about the human cost of the conflict and the impossibility of Afghanistan enjoying genuine human rights until the fighting ends. He did this to the point of denying that any real human rights progress had come in his presidency (thus implying that bringing in Taliban would not make matters worse).

In terms of your messaging, it would be great if, when the Secretary stresses that reconciling insurgents should accept the Afghan constitution and laws, she specifically mentions the right of girls to go to school and work and take part in the political process. That would be consistent, I think, with what the administration has said before, but more explicit. Karzai told us that his government already stresses those specific rights (that's not true -- but it suggests that it would be hard for them to disagree if the US and international community made it part of their mantra).

It would also, of course, be great if she could find a way to express concern about giving reconciling Taliban leaders who have a track record of brutality, including attacks on girls schools and killings of women who defy their threats, positions in local or national government. One can support negotiations even with the worst of the worst of the Taliban, and offer them other kinds of incentives. But we should draw the line at offering positions of authority over the lives of the people they have been terrorizing (as the Pakistanis did, disastrously, in Swat).

Hope this helps,

Tom

RELEASE IN FULL

July 14, 2010

Karzai: Opening pitch: Where is the war on terror? Even the Americans say it is in Pakistan. That's where al Qaeda is. In Afghanistan, it is our insurgency, something between ourselves that we have to resolve. We have been at war for 30 years; nothing is more important than ending this.

I know the Taliban better than anyone else. They killed my father, they've killed thousands. We chased them out after just 1.5 months nine years ago. Yet today, people are still being killed.

I could say that I was happier with human rights in Afghanistan today than under the Soviets, or during the civil war, or under the Taliban, but it would be a political statement; it would not be from my heart. How can I claim that human rights are in a better situation here when there are thousands of people being killed?

More on toll of war – he shows us his daily casualty reports for the previous Wednesday, reads off the totals for Afghan civilians, ISAF troops, Afghan troops, and "enemy" troops (and then hastens to add that he disagrees with the term "enemy.")

What would you do if you see happy occasion in one corner of the room and a tragedy in the other? Do you go to the happy corner? No of course you go to the tragedy, and that is my focus/priority.

Malinowski – I respect your argument. Most leaders would tell us to focus on the positive. I've Never argued with a head of state that human rights situation in his country was actually better than he thinks. But have to disagree with you – as horrific as the problems still are, there has been progress in the last ten years in part because of steps your government has taken– for example, having 37% of girls in school is not good enough, but it's far better than nightmare that preceded it. (Karzai – yes, and there is a free press, elections, other progress). So yes, to deal with the massive suffering you need to pursue peace. But how do pursue peace without jeopardizing the gains made, including in women's rights?

Karzai – Peace will never jeopardize progress, war will.

Malinowski – Imagine there is a Taliban shadow governor who is responsible for the destruction of girls' schools and issuing death threats through night letters. Can you conceive of a deal in which that man is made the real governor of his district or province, if he simply agrees to respect the Afghan Constitution going forward?

Karzai – Not necessarily. But if he agrees to leave aside his arms, abide by the law, settle down to a life under the constitution.

One option is peace, one is a deal. The other is war. If it is a deal then you'll be the district governor but leave behind the violence. If that brings peace then what would you do? Knowing he has a bad character, and becomes the district governor, or that he continues the conflict?

Q to Tom -- what would you do if it was in Nashville, TN and this was the only way to stop a war claiming so many lives?

Malinowski – I wouldn't make him mayor of Nashville.

Karzai - We have that now in our government. We have people with terrible pasts in the government.

We had vetting but it went wrong. Look at what happened in parliamentary vetting. The weaker people who had committed fewer violations were removed; the bigger ones who committed worse acts were allowed.

Malinowski – we have more than just the two choices you suggested. There is a middle ground between trying to kill Taliban leaders and making them the leaders of one's community.

Karzai – OK, what does it look like?

Malinowski – peace and reconciliation, an agreement to stop fighting and killing each other, perhaps exile for some people, perhaps giving them the chance to run for political office on a level playing field with everyone else (including vetting). But not necessarily giving them jobs in which they will have authority over peoples' lives.

There are obviously more complicated issues having to do with transitional justice. As you know, we opposed the amnesty law (Karzai turns to his aides and says: "That was the thing the Parliament did, right?"). But even if one supports amnesties, that's different from allowing Taliban leaders positions of authority.

Karzai - If you have a choice between saving a girl's life and preserving her chance to go to school, which would you do first? Obviously, saving lives must come first. Ending this war must come first.

Malinowski - There is undeniable logic to that argument, but in practice we've found that you have to pursue peace and human rights together. Look at what happened to the Pakistanis in Swat. They made a hasty deal with the Pakistani Taliban, allowed them to come in and take power. Women were kept from school and work; there were awful cases of public whippings and abuse that shocked the Pakistani public. And before long, war broke out again and the Pakistani army had to retake what they gave away. They tried to trade rights for peace and got neither.

Karzai - Don't worry about the Taliban being part of government (suggests long way off, only talk). And if we get there, Afghan people will have a chance to decide these questions. Not up to me.

Malinowski – Good that women have been increasingly included in these discussions, including in the Peace Jirga. Will they be included in any negotiations with the Taliban?

Karzai - Yes. They will be present in the negotiations.

The overall question is the rights of the Afghan people. We are starving for human rights in Afghanistan. Most of all, the right to life.

Malinowski – When you say that Taliban members must abide by the Constitution and Afghan laws to reconcile, can you add a subordinate clause, specifically mentioning that they must accept the right of women to go to school, work, participate in politics? Those are all part of Afghan law; stressing them explicitly would reassure us and send the right signal to the Taliban.

Karzai: Turns to his aides: Don't we already say that? They answer "yes." We do, we have; it's in the declaration of the peace jirga [note: it is not].

MILITIAS

Karzai: Afghans don't want militias; it's a disaster for this country; we've made this very clear. They are security firms, transportation companies, they are everywhere.

Community guard police are what we need, recruited through police procedures and not paid by commanders; paid as individuals.

In 2001, PM boasted of manipulating Oslo accords

By Liel Leibovitz | Jul 15, 2010 4:03 PM

Meeting with Benjamin Netanyahu last week, President Obama could not have been more effusive. "I believe Prime Minister Netanyahu wants peace," Obama said [1]. "I believe he is ready to take risks for peace."

A newly revealed tape of Netanyahu in 2001, being interviewed while he thinks the cameras are off, shows him in a radically different light. In it, Netanyahu dismisses American foreign policy as easy to maneuver, boasts of having derailed the Oslo accords with political trickery, and suggests that the only way to deal with the Palestinians is to "beat them up, not once but repeatedly, beat them up so it hurts so badly, until it's unbearable" (all translations are mine).

According [2] to Haaretz's Gideon Levy, the video should be "Banned for viewing by children so as not to corrupt them, and distributed around the country and the world so that everyone will know who leads the government of Israel."

Netanyahu is speaking to a small group of terror victims in the West Bank settlement of Ofra two years after stepping down as prime minister in 1999. He appears laid-back. After claiming that the only way to deal with the Palestinian Authority was a large-scale attack, Netanyahu was asked by one of the participants whether or not the United States would let such an attack come to fruition.

"I know what America is," Netanyahu replied. "America is a thing you can move very easily, move it in the right direction. They won't get in their way." He then called former president Bill Clinton "radically pro-Palestinian," and went on to belittle the Oslo peace accords as vulnerable to manipulation. Since the accords state that Israel would be allowed to hang on to pre-defined military zones in the West Bank, Netanyahu told his hosts that he could torpedo the accords by defining vast swaths of land as just that.

"They asked me before the election if I'd honor [the Oslo accords]," Netanyahu said. "I said I would, but ... I'm going to interpret the accords in such a way that would allow me to put an end to this galloping forward to the '67 borders. How did we do it? Nobody said what defined military zones were. Defined military zones are security zones; as far as I'm concerned, the entire Jordan Valley is a defined military zone. Go argue."

Smiling, Netanyahu then recalled how he forced former U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher to agree to let Israel alone determine which parts of the West Bank were to be defined as military zones. "They didn't want to give me that letter," Netanyahu said, "so I didn't give them the Hebron agreement [the agreement giving Hebron back to the Palestinians]. I cut the cabinet meeting short and said, 'I'm not signing.' Only when the letter came, during that meeting, to me and to Arafat, did I ratify the Hebron agreement. Why is this important? Because from that moment on, I de facto put an end to the Oslo accords."

President Obama, and anyone else concerned about Israel's commitment to the peace process, may watch the tape online here [3].

UNAMA chief Staffan De Mistura and his deputy Martin Kobler said they brokered an agreement today between Afghan NSA Spanta, Civil society reps and Sima Simar for the Kabul Conference. There will be one chair at the table and one chair behind. The civil society rep will sit at the table ( the woman who was mentioned earlier (P...?); sorry I don't recall right now; Kathy recognized her name). Sima Simar would sit behind. Eight minutes would be allow for speaking and the civil society rep will begin. Please, however, Staffan and Martin asked that we please keep this compromise quiet so it will hold. Staffan thanked us for our pushing the Afghan government in this direction by our quiet interventions over the past few days.

Dear WMCL Colleagues,
It will take some time for me to get my feet underneath me, and to catch up on all left undone during my recent involuntary vacation in Rwanda's prisons. However, I am well-enough to begin to appreciate how much the entire College community did to assist in securing my release.
I will probably never know all of the contributions to the campaign for my release that came from each of my WMCL colleagues, although Eric has filled me in on many of the efforts within the College, and reaching beyond the College, that helped turn my detention into a spontaneous movement for my release. I owe each of you a lot, particularly Jane and Melissa, who had to deal with the mess of ungraded exams and unreturned calls and emails.
My colleagues who wrote and called others on my behalf and even showed-up at rallies have my deepest appreciation.
While my detention and release have importance for our community, I thought it might be helpful to put your efforts into the larger context, which iput me in danger in Rwanda. At the bottom of this message is a Voice of America story that explains that my arrest is part of a much more significant story, which implicates the U.S. in the deaths of millions in Central Africa over the past three decades.
Since I have already promised my wife to NEVER do anything like this again, it is not a big stretch to make the same promise to each of you....but it is great to know that you were there when I needed you. Many, many thanks.
your grateful colleague,

Rwanda Tribunal Lawyers Denounce Killing of One of Their Own

Nico Colombant | Washington 17 July 2010

An association of lawyers working at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda has denounced the recent killing of one of their colleagues. They also expressed grave concern at the series of murders, arrests and assassination attempts in the run-up to Rwanda's presidential election next month.

The statement by a collective of defense lawyers at the Tanzania-based tribunal for Rwanda, known by its acronym ICTR (sic), was released following the killing of law professor Jwani Mwaikusa earlier this week near his home in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania.

The head of the association, American lawyer and law professor Peter Erlinder, told VOA Mwaikusa had been very active at the tribunal. "Professor Mwaikusa had been successful in preventing a number of cases from being transferred from the ICTR to Rwanda and he also had recently completed a trial in which he announced he was going to be filing an appeal," he said.

Mwaikusa had said the trials would not be fair if they were held in Rwanda.

Erlinder himself was recently jailed for nearly a month in Rwanda on charges of challenging the government's official history of what happened during the 1994 genocide, after trying to represent an opposition leader who was also jailed on genocide denial charges.

The statement calls for an independent investigation of the Mwaikusa murder, as well as guarantees from the United Nations Security Council to ensure the safety of the tribunal's defense lawyers.

Erlinder also said evidence necessary to defense teams is being withheld at the tribunal, and he called for fully disclosing evidence of crimes committed in Rwanda in 1994 by both the former government and current leadership.

"We have a situation where the entire defense at the ICTR is finding itself in a situation where it is very hard to do its work," he said.

The statement by the lawyers said they were afraid Mwaikusa's murder was not isolated. It followed last month's assassination attempt against a former ally turned opponent of Rwandan President Paul Kagame in South Africa, the killing of a journalist in Kigali who was investigating the assassination bid, and the near decapitation of an official from Rwanda's opposition Democratic Green Party, who was found dead near his car earlier this week near the southern town of Butare.

Rwandan authorities have denied any link between the series of murders and attacks and the upcoming election, saying those who insinuate a crackdown is taking place are in their words "frustrated" politicians.

Mr. Kagame, who led the Uganda-backed ethnic minority Tutsi rebellion that took over Rwanda from its Hutu-led government after the genocide, was elected in 2003 with more than 95 percent of the vote. He has expressed confidence he will be re-elected in August.

Rwandan police say they arrested a man in connection with the killing of the opposition leader, saying he was a businessman connected with the Green Party.

Several suspects have been arrested in the case of the journalist.

But there is growing international pressure on Rwanda's government to clarify the situation.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has called for a full investigation into the deaths of the journalist and the opposition leader.

Meanwhile, Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero recently called off a planned meeting with Mr. Kagame, after protests by Spanish human rights groups.

In Spain, a case is pending against dozens of current and former Rwandan officers who have been indicted on charges of genocide and crimes against humanity for alleged reprisal killings during and after the 1994 genocide, in which hundreds of thousands of people, most of them ethnic Tutsis, were killed.

Spanish law allows its courts to prosecute crimes against humanity even if those crimes took place elsewhere.

Subject: Peter Erlinder

Dear Mr. Koh,

I am a colleague of Professor Erlinder and also a graduate of Yale Law School ('79). I invoke the latter connection in hopes of obtaining your attention to a plea on Professor Erlinder's behalf.

Professor Erlinder and I agree on very little politically. Indeed, we disagree on almost every issue. However, I want the U.S. government to do everything it can to speedily obtain Professor Erlinder's release.

I readily acknowledge that I don't understand the underlying merits of the criminal matter. I have heard Professor Erlinder's assertions that his efforts (and those of his colleagues) have exposed many previously hidden truths and those assertions (which include condemnation of the U.N., one of my least favorite organizations) seemed credible to me.

But those merits are, in my opinion, entirely beside the point, as is the question of whether Professor Erlinder was foolish or brave to return to Rwanda. I respect both Don Quixote and Clarence Darrow. The point is that Professor Erlinder put himself at risk to "walk the walk" of a fundamental principle of any free society – the right to counsel. The defendants at the Nuremberg trials had counsel. The Israelis accorded Eichmann counsel.

It now appears that Professor Erlinder's detention may turn into a covert execution. "Under intense interrogation from detectives, detained American Prof. Peter Erlinder swallowed up to 50 tablets meant to treat hypertension and other medical conditions – which the Police now says is also another crime, RNA can exclusively reveal." Rwandan News Agency - Wednesday, 02 June 2010 13:28 by RNA Reporter http://rnanews.com/politics/3496-distressed-peter-erlinder-tries-to-commit-suicide--police-

Please use all the skills and resources at your command to cause our government to help Professor Erlinder to freedom before it is too late.

Thank you.

(AP) Egypt: basis to move to direct peace talks lacking

CAIRO (AP) - Egypt says more work needs to be done to bridge the gap between Israel and the Palestinians before they can move to direct peace talks. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met separately with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. None of them spoke to the press afterward. But Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told reporters the basis to move from indirect to direct talks is still "lacking."

The expression "do more" repeated incessantly in today's press is essentially a negative characterization of the Secretary's position. In general, it is code for "After so much cost and so many losses and so many bombs in our cities, the Americans are telling us we're still not doing enough." This negative interpretation is used by the PakMil to convince Pakistanis that the U.S. is a malign influence and to avoid taking the steps we seek.

When you brief her this morning suggest the following:

- We avoid literally using the words "do more;" but
- Do not hesitate to specify what we want them to do; and
- Let's push back on this view: We acknowledge their contributions and their losses – and we are helping. We would never ask Pakistan to do more alone – we are doing more, too, including supporting Pakistan militarily and economically. Freedom requires constant vigilance and democracy is never "done."

Dear Madam Secretary,

Minister Afzali of the Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs, Martyrs and Disabled (MOLSA) is working hard in her new role as the only confirmed female minister within the Government of Afghanistan. MOLSA has been under-resourced by the international community and the USG, and while we are not shifting significant funds to her ministry, we have undertaken a high-payoff, focused program of mentoring and policy advice.

Minister Afzali views you as a role model and seeks your mentorship & support. She has explained some of her priorities in the attached correspondence and would like to meet briefly with you at the Kabul Conference, a meeting. Time permitting, we would recommend a brief session with some international and Afghan media present. Perhaps at some point Secretary Solis can visit here and deepen the partnership with Minister Afzali.

Respectfully,

Karl

Below are points for the press on the plane. I'll have a hard copy printed:

First major ministerial in Afghanistan since the 1970s. The very fact of it is a big deal.

Context is important. This is not out of the blue, it's not just a random gathering; it's part of a systematic process: Karzai's inauguration, announcement of the President's strategy, London conference, Peace Jirga, and now the Kabul conference.

Increasing Afghan leadership and ownership: They are presenting a set of concrete programs on governance, service delivery, security transition, economic development, and reintegration. These programs are detailed; they are serious; and they reflect months of work and consultation.

Increasing international alignment: The international community is coordinating with each other - through ISAF, Sedwill, de Mistura, etc. - and aligning its efforts with the Afghan programs and priorities being set forth at this conference. This is NOT a pledging conference. It is an opportunity to ensure we are effectively supporting Afghan government leadership and ownership

Follow-through and accountability: In his inauguration, Karzai laid out a credible vision; in London, the Afghan government committed to developing and pursuing specific plans in a variety of areas; at Kabul, we'll be heavily focused on implementation. This is about mutual accountability for the pledges made and the programs set forth.

July 2011: The president's strategy reflects both urgency and resolve: increased resources and intensity in our efforts to take the fight to the enemy and to build Afghan capacity to effect a conditions-based transition; and a long-term civilian commitment to support Afghanistan long into the future.

Clear strategy: Reverse the momentum of the Taliban; build the capacity of Afghan security forces; and as Afghans develop the capability to stabilize their country, we must draw down our combat presence and make a responsible transition to Afghan leadership.

Clear desired end-state: An Afghan state that is willing and strong enough to ensure that global terrorists never again have safe haven within its borders; can withstand internal and external threats; and can continue to make long-term political and economic progress, all with sustainable levels of international support.

Civ-mil cooperation: Unfortunate to lose General McChrystal, but maintained continuity with General Petraeus and we have only intensified our civ-mil engagement both in Kabul and Washington.

Reconciliation: Stress that it is Afghan-led. Note red-lines.

Secretary Clinton may be one of the highest-profile attendees at Tuesday's Kabul Conference, but Afghan women fear their opinions won't be heard—and they worry new deals with fighters will roll back their hard-fought rights.

As Hillary Clinton prepares to attend Tuesday's Kabul Conference, Afghan women are delivering a plain message to government and international officials: Women's voices should be heard.

"We have to be honest. With respect to the Kabul Conference, we have not been consulted," said Soraya Pakzad, founder of a women's shelter in the western Afghan city of Herat. Her comment came during an unusually heated question-and-answer session with Afghan Finance Minister Omar Zakhilwal and United Nations representative Staffan de Mistura marking the end of a two-day women's conference. "We want to be involved in policy-making. We don't want our presence to be purely symbolic."

"Women's rights and achievements should not be compromised in any peace negotiations or accords."

The Kabul Conference is, in part, built on symbolism. A follow-up to January's London Conference, the gathering marks the first time Afghanistan has played host to its international donors, a decision that is intended to showcase the transition from foreign to Afghan ownership of national priorities. More than 65 international delegations are expected to descend upon the Afghan capital, which is already enduring security crackdowns and traffic gridlock. Workers could be seen Sunday painting curbs and planting flowers in advance of the foreigners' arrival.

Discussions will center around five topics, including economic development, agriculture, governance, and security. The goal of the half-day event is to establish a framework for Afghan leadership in the setting—and execution—of the country's political and economic direction.

- Ann Marlowe: The Republican Fight Over Afghanistan

Although it remains to be seen how quickly the Afghan government, long under-resourced and beset by allegations of corruption, will be able to take the reins from its international donors, there is no question that Afghan ownership is the direction in which things are moving, on the political, economic, and security fronts. And that is precisely why women feel the stakes for this week's meeting are so high, particularly in light of new deals to empower local militias that might threaten women's rights.

"After the Kabul Conference, no one knows what else could be on the agenda apart from war escalations and negotiations," said Orzala Ashraf, an Afghan human rights activist. "This is very important for us, to get a serious and honest commitment from our government in the presence of all witnesses from the world that our voices will not be silenced."

Ashraf and a number of other women's advocates view Tuesday's talks are their last, best shot at speaking out about their concerns, with help from European and American officials who have been working hard to help them win a seat at the table. In another show of support, Secretary Clinton and Danish Foreign Minister Lene Espersen will meet Tuesday morning with a group of women leaders.

Regardless of this high-profile backing, many women say they have little faith in the process to produce anything aside from more paper and more unkept promises.

"Women are very tired of all these conferences; the government is going to have to show commitments," said Selay Ghaffar, an Afghan Women's Network board member. "We want things to change."

And it remains unclear how many Afghans outside Kabul, men or women, are paying attention to yet another gathering to discuss their future.

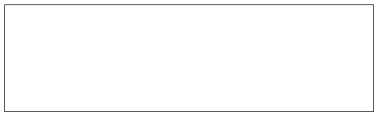
"Women in the provinces don't even know about this," said Zainab, a young math teacher from Helmand province. "I would say 60 percent of women have no idea this is going on."

Others say the presence of one or two women at the Kabul Conference isn't enough to make a difference. And they say they fear the recent move from NATO to empower local militias to fight the Taliban, particularly in southern Afghanistan.

"This is very dangerous," said Shahida Hussain, a human rights advocate from Kandahar who worked as a community organizer during the Taliban years. "We had militias during the communist years and Afghanistan was destroyed. We fear war again."

Women leaders say that they want peace and are glad to welcome back former fighters, but only if they respect women's constitutional guarantee to equal protections under the law.

"Women should be a constituent part of all bodies outlined in the Afghanistan Peace and Reintegration Plan," said the women in a statement at the end of their meeting. "Women's rights and achievements should not be compromised in any peace negotiations or accords."



In the meantime, women continue to fight for a voice as Tuesday approaches. After a weeklong flurry of conference calls, embassy meetings, and lunchtime gatherings, two women aside from government ministers are now slated to speak.

And in a small victory for women, international officials agreed with Pakzad's assessment before pledging that women would be more involved going forward.

"I agree, you were not consulted," said da Mistura, appearing to contradict the Afghan finance minister, who only a few moments earlier had said that women's views had and would be included. "As usual, we have been paying lip service to you and we are all at fault for that."

She went back to Afghanistan for the conference that women had over the weekend and wrote the article that follows for today's Daily Beast.
Soraya mentioned here is one of our Women of Courage. Gayle (the writer) told me in a separate email that De Mistura was very sympathetic and said they should be consulted, that the current documents are working documents and he pledged that the women would be more inovled in the follow up. He also told them that he was very impressed that they had organized themselves in this 2-day conference to be able to play a more effective role. Zakhilwal was gracious, but said they were adequately consulted. So it goes.

Thought you might find this interesting given S' interest in taxation. I knew Pakistan was bad – but this is shocking. 2% of the population paying taxes??? On par with Sierra Leone in tax collection to GDP ratio.

Pakistan's Elite Pay Few Taxes, Widening Gap

By SABRINA TAVERNISE

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Much of Pakistan's capital city looks like a rich Los Angeles suburb. Shiny sport utility vehicles purr down gated driveways. Elegant multistory homes are tended by servants. Laundry is never hung out to dry.

But behind the opulence lurks a troubling fact. Very few of these households pay income tax. That is mostly because the politicians who make the rules are also the country's richest citizens, and are skilled at finding ways to exempt themselves.

That would be a problem in any country. But in Pakistan, the lack of a workable tax system feeds something more menacing: a festering inequality in Pakistani society, where the wealth of its most powerful members is never redistributed or put to use for public good. That is creating conditions that have helped spread an insurgency that is tormenting the country and complicating American policy in the region.

It is also a sorry performance for a country that is among the largest recipients of American aid, payments of billions of dollars that prop up the country's finances and are meant to help its leaders fight the insurgency.

Though the authorities have tried to expand the net in recent years, taxing profits from the stock market and real estate, entire swaths of the economy, like agriculture, a major moneymaker for the elite, remain untaxed.

"This is a system of the elite, by the elite and for the elite," said Riyaz Hussain Naqvi, a retired government official who worked in tax collection for 38 years. "It is a skewed system in which the poor man subsidizes the rich man."

The problem starts at the top. The average worth of Pakistani members of Parliament is $900,000, with its richest member topping $37 million, according to a December study by the Pakistan Institute of Legislative Development and Transparency in Islamabad.

While Pakistan's income from taxes last year was the lowest in the country's history, according to Zafar ul-Majeed, a senior official in the Federal Board of Revenue, the assets of current members of Parliament nearly doubled from those of members of the previous Parliament, the institute study found.

The country's top opposition leader, Nawaz Sharif, reported that he paid no personal income tax for three years ending in 2007 in public documents he filed with Pakistan's election commission. A spokesman for Mr. Sharif, an industrialist who is widely believed to be a millionaire, said he had been in exile and had turned over positions in his companies to relatives.

A month of requests for similar documents for Pakistan's president and prime minister went unanswered by the commission; representatives for the men said they did not have the figures.

"Taxes are the Achilles' heel of Pakistani politicians," said Jahangir Tareen, a businessman and member of Parliament who is trying to put taxes on the public agenda. He paid $225,534 in income tax in 2009, a figure he made public in Parliament last month. "If you don't have income, fine, but then don't go and get into a Land Cruiser."

The rules say that anyone who earns more than $3,488 a year must pay income tax, but few do. Akbar Zaidi, a Karachi-based political economist with the Carnegie Endowment, estimates that as many as 10 million Pakistanis should be paying income tax, far more than the 2.5 million who are registered.

Out of more than 170 million Pakistanis, fewer than 2 percent pay income tax, making Pakistan's revenue from taxes among the lowest in the world, a notch below Sierra Leone's as a ratio of tax to gross domestic product.

Mr. Zaidi blames the United States and its perpetual bailouts of Pakistan for the minuscule tax revenues from rich and poor alike. "The Americans should say: 'Enough. Sort it out yourselves. Get your house in order first,' " he argued. "But you are cowards. You are afraid to take that chance."

Much of the tax avoidance, especially by the wealthy, is legal. Under a 1990s law that has become one of the main tools to legalize undocumented — or illegally obtained — money made in Pakistan, authorities here are not allowed to question money transferred from abroad. Businessmen and politicians channel billions of rupees through Dubai back to Pakistan, no questions asked.

"In this country, no one asks, 'How did you get that flat in Mayfair?' " said Shabbar Zaidi, a partner at A. F. Ferguson & Company, an accounting firm in Karachi, referring to an affluent area of London. "It's a very good country for the rich man. Chauffeurs, servants, big houses. The question is, who is suffering? The common man."

Then there are the tax-free goods supposedly meant for Afghanistan. Mr. Zaidi said much stayed in Pakistan illegally, including 50,000 tons of black tea that were imported last year. Afghans drink green tea.

"As per our information, not a single cup of black tea was drunk in Afghanistan," he said.

Tax collectors try to be tough. When Mr. Naqvi headed the tax authority, he tried to conduct a broad audit, prompting howls of protest. Lawyers from the Lahore High Court Bar Association — also evaders — even issued a ruling against him.

Mr. Majeed said his collectors now use individual electric bills to track down rich evaders, on the assumption that high bills mean air-conditioning, which means wealth. They recently issued hundreds of warnings to rich houses in Islamabad. But going after politicians, he said, is tricky. "Not while they're in power," he said, smiling.

Tax collection has risen by about 20 percent a year recently, he said, though it barely registers as an increase because more than half of Pakistan's economy is off the books.

Lacking the political will to collect income tax, Pakistan resorts to easier measures, like the sales tax, considered less fair because it hits the poor as hard as the rich. Muhamed Azhar, 26, a chauffeur in Karachi with a $123-a-month salary, pays the same sales tax rate as a National Assembly member who makes $1,400 a month with benefits. Earnings from real estate and land are rarely declared.

"The big people ruling us have houses and servants, and they should pay taxes," Mr. Azhar said, watching motorcades of sport utility vehicles zip by, en route to the local Parliament. He sometimes wonders whether they are even going to work at all. With all the tinted windows, guards and fuss, he has never actually seen them.

The overwhelming majority of Pakistan's tax burden is carried by the manufacturing sector for the domestic market, which, according to Mr. Majeed, makes up only 19 percent of Pakistan's economy but pays 51 percent of its taxes.

Most economic activity takes place in the shadows. Merchants — the most vociferous opponents of a value-added tax, a tax the International Monetary Fund has pressed Pakistan to adopt largely because it would require documentation — make up a fifth of the economy, but carry 6 percent of its tax burden. Out of millions of shops in Pakistan, just 160,000 are now registered for a general sales tax, Mr. Majeed said.

Particularly galling for Pakistan's middle class is the lack of a federal tax on agriculture, an industry that employs nearly half of Pakistan's population and whose profits go largely to the wealthy landowners who pack local Parliaments. When the World Bank finally forced adoption of a modest provincial tax in 1997 as a condition for a loan, few paid.

Mr. Tareen, the member of Parliament, said that when he first tried to pay, tax collectors refused to take the money, not wanting to rock the boat. He had to write a letter to a senior official to have it accepted.

It was not always like this. Nasir Aslam Zahid, a former Supreme Court justice in his 70s, blames what he calls moral decay in Pakistani society, in which respect for rules has fallen, merit has been forgotten and cheating has become a way of life.

"In my time, it was considered a moral thing for a person to file a tax return," he said. "Today, corruption has broken all records."

The House Appropriations Committee is apparently going to revise it's allocation for State/USAID – it is reportedly some $1.3 billion better (!). So, the overall cut would be closer to $2.7 billion, not $4 billion. Will report back when that is finalized. Some good news for a change.

Rich,

The Committee circulated a suballocations report to Full Committee members in advance of tomorrow's Full Committee mark-up on the Mil/Qual and Transpo/HUD bills. Adoption of that report will be the first order of business. The S-FOPS allocation proposed in that report is $53.983 billion, which is $1.327 billion above our provisional allocation and the Subcommittee mark. We expect that our Minority Members will oppose the additional funds.

Just spoke to Doug Frantz. A little intel (or not).

As you know, Menendez is driving the train on the June 29th hearing. He will chair. Lautenberg has requested the opportunity to ask questions from the dais, but right now the Committee is pushing back saying they don't want this to devolve into a circus.

Committee may ask State and/or DOJ to produce witness/es who can speak to the agreements entered into that permitted Megrahi to be prosecuted and jailed in Scotland in the first place. From State, they're not sure if that's someone from EUR, NEA, or elsewhere within the Department. This would be at the Committee's insistence and not necessarily Menendez's.

I asked who they think Menendez might want to call as a witness. They said Tony Blair. I laughed. They didn't. Am told the Committee is discouraging Menendez from even making the request. We'll see.

State Department is taking right steps to foster Internet freedom

Wednesday, July 21, 2010; A18

BILLIONS OF people live in countries where the Internet is not free. Confined behind the elaborate firewalls of authoritarian regimes such as China and Iran, they find their rights to expression threatened online and off -- by elaborate systems of monitoring and censorship and by harsh laws that punish bloggers with imprisonment or even death.

In January, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke powerfully in support of Internet freedom, saying, "We stand for a single Internet where all of humanity has equal access to knowledge and ideas. And we recognize that the world's information infrastructure will become what we and others make of it."

Since then, the State Department has brought the issue of online freedom to the table in its diplomacy around the world and joined with Internet providers and social media companies to foster public-private partnership in Internet freedom. Such collaboration is key, since authoritarian regimes so often contract out the daily work of censorship to private companies.

Congress, too, has showed commitment to openness online, allocating $35 million in funding between the 2009 and 2010 budgets for work that promotes Internet freedom. This money has yet to be spent, but the State Department finally has sent the names of designated recipients of the 2009 budget's $5 million in Internet freedom funding to Congress for its approval and soon will begin the process for distributing this year's grants.

As it moves forward on this vital issue, the State Department must carefully determine how best to spend its limited resources. Yes, there is no silver bullet to guarantee freedom on the Internet. But it is possible to do great good with available funds. Investing in censorship-circumvention techniques like those that powered Tehran's "Twitter revolution" in June 2009 could have a tremendous, measurable impact.

Although this solution is not without its problems -- the best-known provider of this software is the Falun Gong-affiliated Global Internet Freedom consortium, and users behind China's Great Firewall may mistrust the technology of a group their government has banned -- the State Department must seriously consider channeling funds to organizations that have demonstrated great potential to make a difference.

The State Department is attempting a more holistic approach to Internet freedom, spreading funds across a variety of projects. Monitoring the efficacy of chosen solutions and rewarding those that produce results will be essential as this program continues.

A cyberspace without walls or barriers, where people can assemble and express themselves freely, without fear of censorship or imprisonment, will make the world safer for the United States and for democracies everywhere. Continued public-private partnership, prioritization of Internet freedom in diplomacy and the wise deployment of allocated funds will move this ideal closer to reality.

Thank you for all you did on behalf of the Afghan women on your whirlwind visit. Emails of gratitude to you are pouring in from Afghanistan. Many of the women listened to your intervention and commented on that as well as your small meeting.

Yesterday, I had to speak at an event with the Congressional Women's Caucus on Maternal Health in Afghanistan. I said that as we were meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room , you were making a major maternal health announcement in Afghanistan. The women Members were overjoyed as were all the health advocates.

This article from the Guardian was sent to me by a UK parliamentarian who intends to echo your remarks. Also, Andrea Mitchell did a great piece on your meeting with the women on NBC.

> Hillary Clinton today promised that any peace deal with the ultra-conservative Taliban movement would not come at the cost of the rights of Afghan women.
> The US secretary of state told a conference of the world's foreign ministers that women in the country "will not be sacrificed" and announced a number of initiatives to improve their situation.
> Her intervention came when many diplomats assume that any deal with hardline insurgents will inevitably involve compromises that would have been unthinkable nine years ago, when the US-led invasion of Afghanistan was in part justified by the desire to emancipate Afghan women.
> But in a meeting with leading Afghan women today Clinton told them that any deal "can't come at the cost of women and women's lives".
> "We are aware of the concerns that many of you have expressed about the reconciliation process and we understand why you would have those concerns," Clinton told them.
> Anxious to put the issue on the agenda of her fellow foreign ministers, she told the conference that women and civil society groups "will be essential to this country's success."
> "If these groups are fully empowered to help build a just and lasting peace, they will help do so," she said. "If they are silenced and pushed to the margins of Afghan society, the prospects for peace and justice will be subverted."
> She also announced extra US funding for projects to improve maternal and child health, including one scheme that will use mullahs to encourage women to make use of clinics. In rural Afghan society, where they are often not allowed to leave the house without their husband's permission, women are sometimes discouraged from seeking medical care.

> The final conference communique recognised "the centrality of women's rights to the future of Afghanistan".
> Earlier this month, a report by Human Rights Watch said the Afghan government was already doing little to protect women and that their rights should be a priority in any political agreement with the Taliban.
> The organisation said in areas under the control of militants, women suffer from violence and intimidation while girls' schools and female activists are attacked. The report identified one case where a female civil servant had to quit her job after receiving a "night letter" from insurgents threatening to kill her.

HANOI - Secretary Clinton expressed concern over Vietnam's arrests of dissidents, attacks on religious groups and curbs on Internet freedom, but said the countries remained friends. The United States and Communist-run Vietnam marked 15 years of diplomatic ties this month and Clinton said the two countries had "learned to see each other not as former enemies but as actual and potential partners, colleagues and friends. We have consistently moved in the direction of engagement and cooperation, even on those issues where we disagree." Clinton spoke during a two-day visit to Hanoi for the Asia-Pacific region's biggest security dialogue.

TEHRAN (Reuters) - Turkey's Foreign Minister said that an agreement had been reached between Iran, Turkey and Brazil over procedures to revive a stalled U.N.-backed nuclear fuel swap deal. When Ahmet Davutoglu was asked by reporters in Tehran whether there would be agreement on the nuclear fuel swap deal, he replied: "Yes, it has been reached after almost 18 hours of negotiations." Turkey's foreign ministry said a formal announcement might be made on the morning of May 17 after any final revisions by the Brazilian and Iranian presidents and the Turkish Prime Minister who reached the agreement at talks in Tehran.

'Inept' US cannot fix Afghanistan: top Saudi prince Sun, May 16, 2010

RIYADH (AFP) – An "inept" United States cannot fix Afghanistan's problems and should simply focus on "chasing the terrorists" there, former Saudi intelligence chief Prince Turki al-Faisal said on Saturday.

The ex-ambassador to the United States also challenged Washington to produce results in just-started Middle East peace talks, and accused US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton of undermining efforts to make the region nuclear-free.

AFP – Saudi Arabia's former intelligence chief Prince Turki al-Faisal delivers a speech during a conference ...

In a speech in Riyadh before diplomats, Turki said US-led NATO troops had irrevocably alienated the Afghan people and had no hope of rebuilding the country.

"What Afghanistan needs now is a shift from nation-building to effectively countering terrorists," Turki told the Arab News conference.

US President Barack Obama "should not be misdirected into believing that he can fix Afghanistan's ills by military means."

"Hunt down the terrorists on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistan border, arrest them or kill them, and get out, and let the Afghan people deal with their problems.

"As long as GI boots remain on Afghan soil, they remain targets of resistance for the Afghan people and ideological mercenaries."

Turki, who has long served a central role in Saudi-Afghan relations, scolded Washington's handling of relations with Kabul.

"The inept way in which this administration has dealt with President (Hamid) Karzai beggars disbelief and amazement.

"Both sides are now filled with resentment and a sour taste in their mouths," he said. "How can they both get out of that situation? I don't know."

The chairman of the King Faisal Center For Research and Islamic Studies, Turki has no official position but is believed to often reflect high level thinking in the Saudi government.

He is the brother of Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal, and analysts speculate he could become foreign minister when Saud retires.

Turki said Arab states have given Washington four months to show progress in US-guided Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

"The Arab world has given Obama until September to get things done," said Turki.

"It is not enough to talk the talk. He has to walk the walk.

"If he does not succeed... then I (will) ask President Obama to do the morally decent gesture and recognise the Palestinian state that he so ardently wishes to exist.

"He can then pack up and leave us in peace and let the Palestinians, Syrians and Lebanese negotiate directly with the Israelis. No more platitudes and good wishes and visions, please."

Turki also faulted the US and European approach in trying to halt Iran's alleged efforts to build a nuclear weapon.

"The discussions on Iran's nuclear ambitions started off on the wrong foot. The carrot and stick approach does not work," he said.

For one, he said, the US and Europe have had double-standards in dealing with Iran on the one hand, and other nuclear countries on the other.

"You cannot ask Iran to play on one level while you allow Israel, India, Pakistan, and North Korea to play on other levels."

Turki said a successful strategy toward Iran requires even-handedness, a "universal nuclear security umbrella" for the countries in the area, and "a good military option" against any regional country which does not cooperate.

He said Clinton had undermined efforts to move toward a regional nuclear-free zone, after the UN Security Council's five permanent members recently expressed support for the idea.

"Alas... Clinton then voided the issue of its value by stating that the conditions do not yet exist for establishing the zone," he said.

"Why, then, did she join the other members of the P5 in issuing their statement?"

Turki said he hoped Obama "will find the way to correct his secretary of state's nullification of making our area free of weapons of mass destruction."

Turki also warned of rising violence in Iraq after the pullout of US troops next year, warning both internal and external groups seek to carve up the country.

"Imagine what will happen once internal strife and fighting escalates" following the US pullout, he said.

Without a UN Security Council effort to protect Iraq's current borders, the consequence could be "regional conflict on a scale not seen since the Ottoman-Safavid wars of the 17th and 18th centuries," he warned.

The ex-ambassador to the United States also challenged Washington to produce results in just-started Middle East peace talks, and accused US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton of undermining efforts to make the region nuclear-free.

AFP – Saudi Arabia's former intelligence chief Prince Turki al-Faisal delivers a speech during a conference ...

In a speech in Riyadh before diplomats, Turki said US-led NATO troops had irrevocably alienated the Afghan people and had no hope of rebuilding the country.

"What Afghanistan needs now is a shift from nation-building to effectively countering terrorists," Turki told the Arab News conference.

US President Barack Obama "should not be misdirected into believing that he can fix Afghanistan's ills by military means."

"Hunt down the terrorists on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistan border, arrest them or kill them, and get out, and let the Afghan people deal with their problems.

"As long as GI boots remain on Afghan soil, they remain targets of resistance for the Afghan people and ideological mercenaries."

Turki, who has long served a central role in Saudi-Afghan relations, scolded Washington's handling of relations with Kabul.

"The inept way in which this administration has dealt with President (Hamid) Karzai beggars disbelief and amazement.

"Both sides are now filled with resentment and a sour taste in their mouths," he said. "How can they both get out of that situation? I don't know."

The chairman of the King Faisal Center For Research and Islamic Studies, Turki has no official position but is believed to often reflect high level thinking in the Saudi government.

He is the brother of Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal, and analysts speculate he could become foreign minister when Saud retires.

Turki said Arab states have given Washington four months to show progress in US-guided Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

"The Arab world has given Obama until September to get things done," said Turki.

"It is not enough to talk the talk. He has to walk the walk.

"If he does not succeed... then I (will) ask President Obama to do the morally decent gesture and recognise the Palestinian state that he so ardently wishes to exist.

"He can then pack up and leave us in peace and let the Palestinians, Syrians and Lebanese negotiate directly with the Israelis. No more platitudes and good wishes and visions, please."

Turki also faulted the US and European approach in trying to halt Iran's alleged efforts to build a nuclear weapon.

"The discussions on Iran's nuclear ambitions started off on the wrong foot. The carrot and stick approach does not work," he said.

For one, he said, the US and Europe have had double-standards in dealing with Iran on the one hand, and other nuclear countries on the other.

"You cannot ask Iran to play on one level while you allow Israel, India, Pakistan, and North Korea to play on other levels."

Turki said a successful strategy toward Iran requires even-handedness, a "universal nuclear security umbrella" for the countries in the area, and "a good military option" against any regional country which does not cooperate.

He said Clinton had undermined efforts to move toward a regional nuclear-free zone, after the UN Security Council's five permanent members recently expressed support for the idea.

"Alas... Clinton then voided the issue of its value by stating that the conditions do not yet exist for establishing the zone," he said.

"Why, then, did she join the other members of the P5 in issuing their statement?"

Turki said he hoped Obama "will find the way to correct his secretary of state's nullification of making our area free of weapons of mass destruction."

Turki also warned of rising violence in Iraq after the pullout of US troops next year, warning both internal and external groups seek to carve up the country.

"Imagine what will happen once internal strife and fighting escalates" following the US pullout, he said.

Without a UN Security Council effort to protect Iraq's current borders, the consequence could be "regional conflict on a scale not seen since the Ottoman-Safavid wars of the 17th and 18th centuries," he warned.

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY CLINTON

Conflict Minerals in the Democratic Republic of Congo

Last year in the Democratic Republic of Congo, I spoke out against the trade in "conflict minerals" that has funded a cycle of conflict there that has left more than 5 million people dead since 1998, displaced countless more, and spawned an epidemic of sexual and gender-based violence.

President Obama has now signed into law a measure that will require corporations to publicly disclose what they are doing to ensure that their products don't contain these minerals. The DRC has formally expressed its support for this law and has thanked both the executive and legislative branches of our government. This is one of several steps we are taking to stop this illicit and deadly trade.

After my visit to the Congo, I directed the State Department to develop a holistic strategy on this issue as part of our broader effort to engage effectively with the DRC. We continue to work with the government to crack down on corruption, both bilaterally and through the Great Lakes Contact Group. At the United Nations Security Council, we successfully pushed to expand the listing criteria in the DRC Sanctions Committee to include those supporting illegal armed groups through illicit trade of natural resources. We have provided support for initiatives on certification and due diligence that have been initiated by the government of the DRC, local and foreign industry groups, and regional and international institutions. And we have met with a wide range of industry representatives and discussed the responsibility of end-users to ensure their supply chains are free of conflict minerals.

All of these steps underscore the commitment of the United States to stand with the people of Congo and to work toward an end to this conflict.

ANKARA (Reuters) - Turkish Prime Minister Erdogan will go to Tehran on May 16, a government official said, to join Brazilian and Turkish negotiators trying to convince Iran to revisit a stalled UN-backed nuclear fuel swap deal. Negotiations were underway on May 16 between Iranian officials and Brazilian President Lula da Silva and Turkish Foreign Minister Davutoglu.

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Obama administration targeted key leaders of Afghanistan's Taliban with new financial sanctions Thursday in a move that could complicate relations with Pakistan and Afghan efforts to reconcile with insurgents.

The action by the Treasury Department will freeze the militants' assets, ban travel and trigger an arms embargo. It follows similar action by the United Nations earlier this week, and comes after calls from Gen. David Petraeus, the top military commander in Afghanistan, and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, for sanctions against Afghan insurgent commanders operating in Pakistan.

Taken together, the U.S. and U.N. sanctions prohibit any financial transactions of the terror leaders in U.N. member countries, putting additional pressure on Pakistan to take broader actions against the Taliban militants.

Three financial kingpins were targeted with sanctions, including a key member of the Haqqani network, which directs operations against U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan from safe havens in Pakistan. Among those sanctioned Thursday was Nasiruddin Haqqani, an emissary for the Haqqani Network and brother of Sirajuddin Haqqani who leads the group with his father, Jalaluddin.

Others sanctioned included Gul Agha Ishakzai, the head of the Taliban's financial commission and Amir Abdullah, the former treasurer to captured Taliban leader Mullah Abdul Ghani Barader. The sanctions placed on the three leaders as terrorists would deprive them of the assets they need to fund their terror operations, said Adam J. Szubin, director of Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control. "We will continue to aggressively work to expose and dismantle the financial networks of terrorist groups in support of the president's goal of a stable Afghanistan," he said.

According to officials, Ishakzai is the head of the Taliban's financial commission, has collected money for suicide attacks in Kandahar, Afghanistan, and has been involved in the disbursement of funds for Taliban fighters. He has served as a main financial officer and close adviser to Taliban leader Mullah Mohammad Omar. Abdullah has reportedly traveled to Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Libya and the United Arab Emirates to raise money for the Taliban and facilitate meetings and communications with key leaders. Nasiruddin Haqqani has collected funds for the Haqqani group, including from al-Qaida. Last week, Gen. David Petraeus, the top military commander in Afghanistan, urged officials to add commanders from the Haqqani network to the terrorist list. At the time, administration officials said a review was under way, largely accelerated after the May 1 failed Times Square bombing. The man who has pleaded guilty in the New York incident, Pakistani-born American Faisal Shahzad, said he trained with the Pakistani Taliban to build bombs, then returned to the U.S. to launch an attack that would avenge attacks on Muslims by U.S. forces overseas.

H: I'm sure you are preoccupied with the adventures of Lula, et al. Nonetheless, the article below, just posted by the NY Review, soon to be published, is a breakthrough piece that will have a large impact. It's worth reading, not least for Frank Luntz's poll numbers. The hysterical tone of much of the Israeli leadership and US Jewish community is partly rooted in this long-term and profound development. Sid

The Failure of the American Jewish Establishment

In 2003, several prominent Jewish philanthropists hired Republican pollster Frank Luntz to explain why American Jewish college students were not more vigorously rebutting campus criticism of Israel. In response, he unwittingly produced the most damning indictment of the organized American Jewish community that I have ever seen.

The philanthropists wanted to know what Jewish students thought about Israel. Luntz found that they mostly didn't. "Six times we have brought Jewish youth together as a group to talk about their Jewishness and connection to Israel," he reported. "Six times the topic of Israel did not come up until it was prompted. Six times these Jewish youth used the word 'they' rather than 'us' to describe the situation."

That Luntz encountered indifference was not surprising. In recent years, several studies have revealed, in the words of Steven Cohen of Hebrew Union College and Ari Kelman of the University of California at Davis, that "non-Orthodox younger Jews, on the whole, feel much less attached to Israel than their elders," with many professing "a near-total absence of positive feelings." In 2008, the student senate at Brandeis, the only nonsectarian Jewish-sponsored university in America, rejected a resolution commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of the Jewish state.

Luntz's task was to figure out what had gone wrong. When he probed the students' views of Israel, he hit up against some firm beliefs. First, "they reserve the right to question the Israeli position." These young Jews, Luntz explained, "resist anything they see as 'group think.'" They want an "open and frank" discussion of Israel and its flaws. Second, "young Jews desperately want peace." When Luntz showed them a series of ads, one of the most popular was entitled "Proof that Israel Wants Peace," and listed offers by various Israeli governments to withdraw from conquered land. Third, "some empathize with the plight of the Palestinians." When Luntz displayed ads depicting Palestinians as violent and hateful, several focus group participants criticized them as stereotypical and unfair, citing their own Muslim friends.

Most of the students, in other words, were liberals, broadly defined. They had imbibed some of the defining values of American Jewish political culture: a belief in open debate, a skepticism about military force, a commitment to human rights. And in their innocence, they did not realize that they were supposed to shed those values when it came to Israel. The only kind of Zionism they found attractive was a Zionism that recognized Palestinians as deserving of dignity and capable of peace, and they were quite willing to condemn an Israeli government that did not share those beliefs. Luntz did not grasp the irony. The only kind of Zionism they found attractive was the kind that the American Jewish establishment has been working against for most of their lives.

Among American Jews today, there are a great many Zionists, especially in the Orthodox world, people deeply devoted to the State of Israel. And there are a great many liberals, especially in the secular Jewish world, people deeply devoted to human rights for all people, Palestinians included. But the two groups are increasingly distinct. Particularly in the younger generations, fewer and fewer American Jewish liberals are Zionists; fewer and fewer American Jewish Zionists are liberal. One reason is that the leading institutions of American Jewry have refused to foster—indeed, have actively opposed—a Zionism that challenges Israel's behavior in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and toward its own Arab citizens. For several decades, the Jewish establishment has asked American Jews to check their liberalism at Zionism's door, and now, to their horror, they are finding that many young Jews have checked their Zionism instead.

Morally, American Zionism is in a downward spiral. If the leaders of groups like AIPAC and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations do not change course, they will wake up one day to find a younger, Orthodox-dominated, Zionist leadership whose naked hostility to Arabs and Palestinians scares even them, and a mass of secular American Jews who range from apathetic to appalled. Saving liberal Zionism in the United States—so that American Jews can help save liberal Zionism in Israel—is the great American Jewish challenge of our age. And it starts where Luntz's students wanted it to start: by talking frankly about Israel's current government, by no longer averting our eyes.

Since the 1990s, journalists and scholars have been describing a bifurcation in Israeli society. In the words of Hebrew University political scientist Yaron Ezrahi, "After decades of what came to be called a national consensus, the Zionist narrative of liberation [has] dissolved into openly contesting versions." One version, "founded on a long memory of persecution, genocide, and a bitter struggle for survival, is pessimistic, distrustful of non-Jews, and believing only in Jewish power and solidarity." Another, "nourished by secularized versions of messianism as well as the Enlightenment idea of progress," articulates "a deep sense of the limits of military force, and a commitment to liberal-democratic values." Every country manifests some kind of ideological divide. But in contemporary Israel, the gulf is among the widest on earth.

As Ezrahi and others have noted, this latter, liberal-democratic Zionism has grown alongside a new individualism, particularly among secular Israelis, a greater demand for free expression, and a greater skepticism of coercive authority. You can see this spirit in "new historians" like Tom Segev who have fearlessly excavated the darker corners of the Zionist past and in jurists like former Supreme Court President Aharon Barak who have overturned Knesset laws that violate the human rights guarantees in Israel's "Basic Laws." You can also see it in former Prime Minister Ehud Barak's apparent willingness to relinquish much of the West Bank in 2000 and early 2001.

But in Israel today, this humane, universalistic Zionism does not wield power. To the contrary, it is gasping for air. To understand how deeply antithetical its values are to those of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, it's worth considering the case of Effi Eitam. Eitam, a charismatic ex–cabinet minister and war hero, has proposed ethnically cleansing Palestinians from the West Bank. "We'll have to expel the overwhelming majority of West Bank Arabs from here and remove Israeli Arabs from [the] political system," he declared in 2006. In 2008, Eitam merged his small Ahi Party into Netanyahu's Likud. And for the 2009–2010 academic year, he is Netanyahu's special emissary for overseas "campus engagement." In that capacity, he visited a dozen American high schools and colleges last fall on the Israeli government's behalf. The group that organized his tour was called "Caravan for Democracy."

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman once shared Eitam's views. In his youth, he briefly joined Meir Kahane's now banned Kach Party, which also advocated the expulsion of Arabs from Israeli soil. Now Lieberman's position might be called "pre-expulsion." He wants to revoke the citizenship of Israeli Arabs who won't swear a loyalty oath to the Jewish state. He tried to prevent two Arab parties that opposed Israel's 2008–2009 Gaza war from running candidates for the Knesset. He said Arab Knesset members who met with representatives of Hamas should be executed. He wants to jail Arabs who publicly mourn on Israeli Independence Day, and he hopes to permanently deny citizenship to Arabs from other countries who marry Arab citizens of Israel.

You don't have to be paranoid to see the connection between Lieberman's current views and his former ones. The more you strip Israeli Arabs of legal protection, and the more you accuse them of treason, the more thinkable a policy of expulsion becomes. Lieberman's American defenders often note that in theory he supports a Palestinian state. What they usually fail to mention is that for him, a two-state solution means redrawing Israel's border so that a large chunk of Israeli Arabs find themselves exiled to another country, without their consent.

Lieberman served as chief of staff during Netanyahu's first term as prime minister. And when it comes to the West Bank, Netanyahu's own record is in its way even more extreme than his protégé's. In his 1993 book, A Place among the Nations, Netanyahu not only rejects the idea of a Palestinian state, he denies that there is such a thing as a Palestinian. In fact, he repeatedly equates the Palestinian bid for statehood with Nazism. An Israel that withdraws from the West Bank, he has declared, would be a "ghetto-state" with "Auschwitz borders." And the effort "to gouge Judea and Samaria [the West Bank] out of Israel" resembles Hitler's bid to wrench the German-speaking "Sudeten district" from Czechoslovakia in 1938. It is unfair, Netanyahu insists, to ask Israel to concede more territory since it has already made vast, gut-wrenching concessions. What kind of concessions? It has abandoned its claim to Jordan, which by rights should be part of the Jewish state.

On the left of Netanyahu's coalition sits Ehud Barak's emasculated Labor Party, but whatever moderating potential it may have is counterbalanced by what is, in some ways, the most illiberal coalition partner of all, Shas, the ultra-Orthodox party representing Jews of North African and Middle Eastern descent. At one point, Shas—like some of its Ashkenazi ultra-Orthodox counterparts—was open to dismantling settlements. In recent years, however, ultra-Orthodox Israelis, anxious to find housing for their large families, have increasingly moved to the West Bank, where thanks to government subsidies it is far cheaper to live. Not coincidentally, their political parties have swung hard against territorial compromise. And they have done so with a virulence that reflects ultra-Orthodox Judaism's profound hostility to liberal values. Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, Shas's immensely powerful spiritual leader, has called Arabs "vipers," "snakes," and "ants." In 2005, after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon proposed dismantling settlements in the Gaza Strip, Yosef urged that "God strike him down." The official Shas newspaper recently called President Obama "an Islamic extremist."

Hebrew University Professor Ze'ev Sternhell is an expert on fascism and a winner of the prestigious Israel Prize. Commenting on Lieberman and the leaders of Shas in a recent Op-Ed in Haaretz, he wrote, "The last time politicians holding views similar to theirs were in power in post–World War II Western Europe was in Franco's Spain." With their blessing, "a crude and multifaceted campaign is being waged against the foundations of the democratic and liberal order." Sternhell should know. In September 2008, he was injured when a settler set off a pipe bomb at his house.

Israeli governments come and go, but the Netanyahu coalition is the product of frightening, long-term trends in Israeli society: an ultra-Orthodox population that is increasing dramatically, a settler movement that is growing more radical and more entrenched in the Israeli bureaucracy and army, and a Russian immigrant community that is particularly prone to anti-Arab racism. In 2009, a poll by the Israel Democracy Institute found that 53 percent of Jewish Israelis (and 77 percent of recent immigrants from the former USSR) support encouraging Arabs to leave the country. Attitudes are worst among Israel's young. When Israeli high schools held mock elections last year, Lieberman won. This March, a poll found that 56 percent of Jewish Israeli high school students—and more than 80 percent of religious Jewish high school students—would deny Israeli Arabs the right to be elected to the Knesset. An education ministry official called the survey "a huge warning signal in light of the strengthening trends of extremist views among the youth."

You might think that such trends, and the sympathy for them expressed by some in Israel's government, would occasion substantial public concern—even outrage—among the leaders of organized American Jewry. You would be wrong. In Israel itself, voices from the left, and even center, warn in increasingly urgent tones about threats to Israeli democracy. (Former Prime Ministers Ehud Olmert and Ehud Barak have both said that Israel risks becoming an "apartheid state" if it continues to hold the West Bank. This April, when settlers forced a large Israeli bookstore to stop selling a book critical of the occupation, Shulamit Aloni, former head of the dovish Meretz Party, declared that "Israel has not been democratic for some time now.") But in the United States, groups like AIPAC and the Presidents' Conference patrol public discourse, scolding people who contradict their vision of Israel as a state in which all leaders cherish democracy and yearn for peace.

The result is a terrible irony. In theory, mainstream American Jewish organizations still hew to a liberal vision of Zionism. On its website, AIPAC celebrates Israel's commitment to "free speech and minority rights." The Conference of Presidents declares that "Israel and the United States share political, moral and intellectual values including democracy, freedom, security and peace." These groups would never say, as do some in Netanyahu's coalition, that Israeli Arabs don't deserve full citizenship and West Bank Palestinians don't deserve human rights. But in practice, by defending virtually anything any Israeli government does, they make themselves intellectual bodyguards for Israeli leaders who threaten the very liberal values they profess to admire.

After Israel's elections last February, for instance, Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Presidents' Conference, explained that Avigdor Lieberman's agenda was "far more moderate than the media has presented it." Insisting that Lieberman bears no general animus toward Israeli Arabs, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency that "He's not saying expel them. He's not saying punish them." (Permanently denying citizenship to their Arab spouses or jailing them if they publicly mourn on Israeli Independence Day evidently does not qualify as punishment.) The ADL has criticized anti-Arab bigotry in the past, and the American Jewish Committee, to its credit, warned that Lieberman's proposed loyalty oath would "chill Israel's democratic political debate." But the Forward summed up the overall response of America's communal Jewish leadership in its headline "Jewish Leaders Largely Silent on Lieberman's Role in Government."

Not only does the organized American Jewish community mostly avoid public criticism of the Israeli government, it tries to prevent others from leveling such criticism as well. In recent years, American Jewish organizations have waged a campaign to discredit the world's most respected international human rights groups. In 2006, Foxman called an Amnesty International report on Israeli killing of Lebanese civilians "bigoted, biased, and borderline anti-Semitic." The Conference of Presidents has announced that "biased NGOs include Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, Christian Aid, [and] Save the Children." Last summer, an AIPAC spokesman declared that Human Rights Watch "has repeatedly demonstrated its anti-Israel bias." When the Obama administration awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom to Mary Robinson, former UN high commissioner for human rights, the ADL and AIPAC both protested, citing the fact that she had presided over the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa. (Early drafts of the conference report implicitly accused Israel of racism. Robinson helped expunge that defamatory charge, angering Syria and Iran.)

Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International are not infallible. But when groups like AIPAC and the Presidents' Conference avoid virtually all public criticism of Israeli actions—directing their outrage solely at Israel's neighbors—they leave themselves in a poor position to charge bias. Moreover, while American Jewish groups claim that they are simply defending Israel from its foes, they are actually taking sides in a struggle within Israel between radically different Zionist visions. At the very moment the Anti-Defamation League claimed that Robinson harbored an "animus toward Israel," an alliance of seven Israeli human rights groups publicly congratulated her on her award. Many of those groups, like B'Tselem, which monitors Israeli actions in the Occupied Territories, and the Israeli branch of Physicians for Human Rights, have been at least as critical of Israel's actions in Lebanon, Gaza, and the West Bank as have Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

All of which raises an uncomfortable question. If American Jewish groups claim that Israel's overseas human rights critics are motivated by anti- Israeli, if not anti-Semitic, bias, what does that say about Israel's domestic human rights critics? The implication is clear: they must be guilty of self-hatred, if not treason. American Jewish leaders don't generally say that, of course, but their allies in the Netanyahu government do. Last summer, Israel's vice prime minister, Moshe Ya'alon, called the anti-occupation group Peace Now a "virus." This January, a right-wing group called Im Tirtzu accused Israeli human rights organizations of having fed information to the Goldstone Commission that investigated Israel's Gaza war. A Knesset member from Netanyahu's Likud promptly charged Naomi Chazan, head of the New Israel Fund, which supports some of those human rights groups, with treason, and a member of Lieberman's party launched an investigation aimed at curbing foreign funding of Israeli NGOs.

To their credit, Foxman and other American Jewish leaders opposed the move, which might have impaired their own work. But they are reaping what they sowed. If you suggest that mainstream human rights criticism of Israel's government is motivated by animus toward the state, or toward Jews in general, you give aid and comfort to those in Israel who make the same charges against the human rights critics in their midst.

In the American Jewish establishment today, the language of liberal Zionism—with its idioms of human rights, equal citizenship, and territorial compromise—has been drained of meaning. It remains the lingua franca in part for generational reasons, because many older American Zionists still see themselves as liberals of a sort. They vote Democratic; they are unmoved by biblical claims to the West Bank; they see average Palestinians as decent people betrayed by bad leaders; and they are secular. They don't want Jewish organizations to criticize Israel from the left, but neither do they want them to be agents of the Israeli right.

These American Zionists are largely the product of a particular era. Many were shaped by the terrifying days leading up to the Six-Day War, when it appeared that Israel might be overrun, and by the bitter aftermath of the Yom Kippur War, when much of the world seemed to turn against the Jewish state. In that crucible, Israel became their Jewish identity, often in conjunction with the Holocaust, which the 1967 and 1973 wars helped make central to American Jewish life. These Jews embraced Zionism before the settler movement became a major force in Israeli politics, before the 1982 Lebanon war, before the first intifada. They fell in love with an Israel that was more secular, less divided, and less shaped by the culture, politics, and theology of occupation. And by downplaying the significance of Avigdor Lieberman, the settlers, and Shas, American Jewish groups allow these older Zionists to continue to identify with that more internally cohesive, more innocent Israel of their youth, an Israel that now only exists in their memories.

But these secular Zionists aren't reproducing themselves. Their children have no memory of Arab armies massed on Israel's border and of Israel surviving in part thanks to urgent military assistance from the United States. Instead, they have grown up viewing Israel as a regional hegemon and an occupying power. As a result, they are more conscious than their parents of the degree to which Israeli behavior violates liberal ideals, and less willing to grant Israel an exemption because its survival seems in peril. Because they have inherited their parents' liberalism, they cannot embrace their uncritical Zionism. Because their liberalism is real, they can see that the liberalism of the American Jewish establishment is fake.

To sustain their uncritical brand of Zionism, therefore, America's Jewish organizations will need to look elsewhere to replenish their ranks. They will need to find young American Jews who have come of age during the West Bank occupation but are not troubled by it. And those young American Jews will come disproportionately from the Orthodox world.

Because they marry earlier, intermarry less, and have more children, Orthodox Jews are growing rapidly as a share of the American Jewish population. According to a 2006 American Jewish Committee (AJC) survey, while Orthodox Jews make up only 12 percent of American Jewry over the age of sixty, they constitute 34 percent between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four. For America's Zionist organizations, these Orthodox youngsters are a potential bonanza. In their yeshivas they learn devotion to Israel from an early age; they generally spend a year of religious study there after high school, and often know friends or relatives who have immigrated to Israel. The same AJC study found that while only 16 percent of non-Orthodox adult Jews under the age of forty feel "very close to Israel," among the Orthodox the figure is 79 percent. As secular Jews drift away from America's Zionist institutions, their Orthodox counterparts will likely step into the breach. The Orthodox "are still interested in parochial Jewish concerns," explains Samuel Heilman, a sociologist at the City University of New York. "They are among the last ones who stayed in the Jewish house, so they now control the lights."

But it is this very parochialism—a deep commitment to Jewish concerns, which often outweighs more universal ones—that gives Orthodox Jewish Zionism a distinctly illiberal cast. The 2006 AJC poll found that while 60 percent of non-Orthodox American Jews under the age of forty support a Palestinian state, that figure drops to 25 percent among the Orthodox. In 2009, when Brandeis University's Theodore Sasson asked American Jewish focus groups about Israel, he found Orthodox participants much less supportive of dismantling settlements as part of a peace deal. Even more tellingly, Reform, Conservative, and unaffiliated Jews tended to believe that average Palestinians wanted peace, but had been ill-served by their leaders. Orthodox Jews, by contrast, were more likely to see the Palestinian people as the enemy, and to deny that ordinary Palestinians shared any common interests or values with ordinary Israelis or Jews.

Orthodox Judaism has great virtues, including a communal warmth and a commitment to Jewish learning unmatched in the American Jewish world. (I'm biased, since my family attends an Orthodox synagogue.) But if current trends continue, the growing influence of Orthodox Jews in America's Jewish communal institutions will erode even the liberal-democratic veneer that today covers American Zionism. In 2002, America's major Jewish organizations sponsored a large Israel solidarity rally on the Washington Mall. Up and down the east coast, yeshivas shut down for the day, swelling the estimated Orthodox share of the crowd to close to 70 percent. When the then Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz told the rally that "innocent Palestinians are suffering and dying as well," he was booed.

America's Jewish leaders should think hard about that rally. Unless they change course, it portends the future: an American Zionist movement that does not even feign concern for Palestinian dignity and a broader American Jewish population that does not even feign concern for Israel. My own children, given their upbringing, could as easily end up among the booers as among Luntz's focus group. Either prospect fills me with dread.

In 2004, in an effort to prevent weapons smuggling from Egypt, Israeli tanks and bulldozers demolished hundreds of houses in the Rafah refugee camp in the southern Gaza Strip. Watching television, a veteran Israeli commentator and politician named Tommy Lapid saw an elderly Palestinian woman crouched on all fours looking for her medicines amid the ruins of her home. He said she reminded him of his grandmother.

In that moment, Lapid captured the spirit that is suffocating within organized American Jewish life. To begin with, he watched. In my experience, there is an epidemic of not watching among American Zionists today. A Red Cross study on malnutrition in the Gaza Strip, a bill in the Knesset to allow Jewish neighborhoods to bar entry to Israeli Arabs, an Israeli human rights report on settlers burning Palestinian olive groves, three more Palestinian teenagers shot—it's unpleasant. Rationalizing and minimizing Palestinian suffering has become a kind of game. In a more recent report on how to foster Zionism among America's young, Luntz urges American Jewish groups to use the word "Arabs, not Palestinians," since "the term 'Palestinians' evokes images of refugee camps, victims and oppression," while "'Arab' says wealth, oil and Islam."

Of course, Israel—like the United States—must sometimes take morally difficult actions in its own defense. But they are morally difficult only if you allow yourself some human connection to the other side. Otherwise, security justifies everything. The heads of AIPAC and the Presidents' Conference should ask themselves what Israel's leaders would have to do or say to make them scream "no." After all, Lieberman is foreign minister; Effi Eitam is touring American universities; settlements are growing at triple the rate of the Israeli population; half of Israeli Jewish high school students want Arabs barred from the Knesset. If the line has not yet been crossed, where is the line?

What infuriated critics about Lapid's comment was that his grandmother died at Auschwitz. How dare he defile the memory of the Holocaust? Of course, the Holocaust is immeasurably worse than anything Israel has done or ever will do. But at least Lapid used Jewish suffering to connect to the suffering of others. In the world of AIPAC, the Holocaust analogies never stop, and their message is always the same: Jews are licensed by their victimhood to worry only about themselves. Many of Israel's founders believed that with statehood, Jews would rightly be judged on the way they treated the non-Jews living under their dominion. "For the first time we shall be the majority living with a minority," Knesset member Pinchas Lavon declared in 1948, "and we shall be called upon to provide an example and prove how Jews live with a minority."

But the message of the American Jewish establishment and its allies in the Netanyahu government is exactly the opposite: since Jews are history's permanent victims, always on the knife-edge of extinction, moral responsibility is a luxury Israel does not have. Its only responsibility is to survive. As former Knesset speaker Avraham Burg writes in his remarkable 2008 book, The Holocaust Is Over; We Must Rise From Its Ashes, "Victimhood sets you free."

This obsession with victimhood lies at the heart of why Zionism is dying among America's secular Jewish young. It simply bears no relationship to their lived experience, or what they have seen of Israel's. Yes, Israel faces threats from Hezbollah and Hamas. Yes, Israelis understandably worry about a nuclear Iran. But the dilemmas you face when you possess dozens or hundreds of nuclear weapons, and your adversary, however despicable, may acquire one, are not the dilemmas of the Warsaw Ghetto. The year 2010 is not, as Benjamin Netanyahu has claimed, 1938. The drama of Jewish victimhood—a drama that feels natural to many Jews who lived through 1938, 1948, or even 1967—strikes most of today's young American Jews as farce.

But there is a different Zionist calling, which has never been more desperately relevant. It has its roots in Israel's Independence Proclamation, which promised that the Jewish state "will be based on the precepts of liberty, justice and peace taught by the Hebrew prophets," and in the December 1948 letter from Albert Einstein, Hannah Arendt, and others to The New York Times, protesting right-wing Zionist leader Menachem Begin's visit to the United States after his party's militias massacred Arab civilians in the village of Deir Yassin. It is a call to recognize that in a world in which Jewish fortunes have radically changed, the best way to memorialize the history of Jewish suffering is through the ethical use of Jewish power.

For several months now, a group of Israeli students has been traveling every Friday to the East Jerusalem neighborhood of Sheikh Jarrah, where a Palestinian family named the Ghawis lives on the street outside their home of fifty-three years, from which they were evicted to make room for Jewish settlers. Although repeatedly arrested for protesting without a permit, and called traitors and self-haters by the Israeli right, the students keep coming, their numbers now swelling into the thousands. What if American Jewish organizations brought these young people to speak at Hillel? What if this was the face of Zionism shown to America's Jewish young? What if the students in Luntz's focus group had been told that their generation faces a challenge as momentous as any in Jewish history: to save liberal democracy in the only Jewish state on earth?

"Too many years I lived in the warm embrace of institutionalized elusiveness and was a part of it," writes Avraham Burg. "I was very comfortable there." I know; I was comfortable there too. But comfortable Zionism has become a moral abdication. Let's hope that Luntz's students, in solidarity with their counterparts at Sheikh Jarrah, can foster an uncomfortable Zionism, a Zionism angry at what Israel risks becoming, and in love with what it still could be. Let's hope they care enough to try.

You may have been alerted to this incident: the barring of Noam Chomsky from Israel. His political views may be ridiculous or objectionable, though he is the greatest linguistic scholar in the world, but barring him for his political opinions has created a needless PR disaster, not least for the US, as he is, after all, a US citizen, and a very prominent one internationally. It is unfortunate on every level. And the US should not be a passive onlooker. He is a US citizen barred for his political views, after all. This story is splashed across the European press this morning. Not what anyone needs, yes, yes, like a hole in the head, and bone stupid, but the US effort on his behalf to gain entry should be part of the story. This incident can be profitable if Israel understands it should not be doing this to US or European critics in the future. This is a downward slope, bad news for everyone involved. S

Chomsky Barred From West Bank by Israel

By ROBERT MACKEY

Noam Chomsky, an American linguist and political thinker who has been critical of Israel, was denied entry into the West Bank on Sunday by Israeli immigration officials when he tried to cross into the Palestinian territory from Jordan to deliver a lecture.

Amira Hass of the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported:

No reason was initially given for the decision, but the Interior Ministry later said immigration officials at the Allenby Bridge border crossing from Jordan had misunderstood Chomsky's intentions thinking initially he was also due to visit Israel. Chomsky, who is on a speaking tour in the region, was scheduled to speak at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank on Monday.

A spokeswoman for Israel's interior ministry also told Reuters that there had been a misunderstanding and "officials were trying to get clearance from the Israeli military, which controls access to the West Bank to allow Chomsky to enter."

In a television interview from Amman, Jordan, after he was rebuffed, Mr. Chomsky told Al Jazeera English, "the facts were completely clear to everyone; there was no basis for a misunderstanding." He explained that he was interrogated for several hours before being told that he would not be allowed to cross into the occupied Palestinian territory. The 81-year-old scholar added:

I can only say what was conveyed to me in the discussion with the official who was carrying out the interrogation — he was receiving instructions from the [Israeli] ministry of interior and relaying them. There were two basic points. One was that the government of Israel does not like the kinds of things I say — which puts them into the category of I suppose every other government in the world. The second was that they seemed upset about the fact that I was just taking an invitation from Bir Zeit and I had no plans to go on to speak in Israeli universities, as I have done many times in the past but not this time.

Mr. Chomsky had been invited to speak about American foreign and domestic policy by the philosophy department at the Palestinian university in Ramallah.

The renowned linguist was outspoken in his opposition to the Israeli offensive in Gaza, which ended in January 2009 and has criticized Israel's occupation of Palestinian territory many times.

In an interview with Deborah Solomon of The New York Times Magazine in 2003, Mr. Chomsky said, "I objected to the founding of Israel as a Jewish state. I don't think a Jewish or Christian or Islamic state is a proper concept. I would object to the United States as a Christian state." When Ms. Solomon pressed Mr. Chomsky on his opposition to Israel, saying, "Your father was a respected Hebraic scholar, and sometimes you sound like a self-hating Jew," he replied:

It is a shame that critics of Israeli policies are seen as either anti-Semites or self-hating Jews. It's grotesque. If an Italian criticized Italian policies, would he be seen as a self-hating Italian?

All

The Post wrote a good editorial today on our Internet freedom work (see below). It's a far cry from what the editorial board had to say in November (here) and is the product of a lot of hard work from several bureaus and offices in the Department to drive Internet freedom as a policy priority. EEB and DRL will convene a meeting of the NetFreedom Taskforce next week at the working level to continue to advance Internet freedom within the building and with external audiences. It is nice to see some success in changing the narrative on this important but challenging issue.

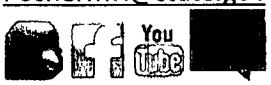
Wednesday, July 21, 2010; A18

BILLIONS OF people live in countries where the Internet is not free. Confined behind the elaborate firewalls of authoritarian regimes such as China and Iran, they find their rights to expression threatened online and off -- by elaborate systems of monitoring and censorship and by harsh laws that punish bloggers with imprisonment or even death.

In January, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke powerfully in support of Internet freedom, saying, "We stand for a single Internet where all of humanity has equal access to knowledge and ideas. And we recognize that the world's information infrastructure will become what we and others make of it."

Since then, the State Department has brought the issue of online freedom to the table in its diplomacy around the world and joined with Internet providers and social media companies to foster public-private partnership in Internet freedom. Such collaboration is key, since authoritarian regimes so often contract out the daily work of censorship to private companies.

Congress, too, has showed commitment to openness online, allocating $35 million in funding between the 2009 and 2010 budgets for work that promotes Internet freedom. This money has yet to be spent, but the State Department finally has sent the names of designated recipients of the 2009 budget's $5 million in Internet freedom funding to Congress for its approval and soon will begin the process for distributing this year's grants.



As it moves forward on this vital issue, the State Department must carefully determine how best to spend its limited resources. Yes, there is no silver bullet to guarantee freedom on the Internet. But it is possible to do great good with available funds. Investing in censorship-circumvention techniques like those that powered Tehran's "Twitter revolution" in June 2009 could have a tremendous, measurable impact.

Although this solution is not without its problems -- the best-known provider of this software is the Falun Gong-affiliated Global Internet Freedom consortium, and users behind China's Great Firewall may mistrust the technology of a group their government has banned -- the State Department must seriously consider channeling funds to organizations that have demonstrated great potential to make a difference.

The State Department is attempting a more holistic approach to Internet freedom, spreading funds across a variety of projects. Monitoring the efficacy of chosen solutions and rewarding those that produce results will be essential as this program continues.

A cyberspace without walls or barriers, where people can assemble and express themselves freely, without fear of censorship or imprisonment, will make the world safer for the United States and for democracies everywhere. Continued public-private partnership, prioritization of Internet freedom in diplomacy and the wise deployment of allocated funds will move this ideal closer to reality.

Subject: B. KOUCHNER in Le Monde re Internet freedom

The below by Kouchner is worth reading if you haven't seen it.

The Internet: a critical international policy issue, by Bernard Kouchner (May 10, 2010)

In 2015, three and a half billion people - half of mankind - will have access to the Internet. There has never been such a revolution in the freedom of communication and the freedom of expression. But how will this new medium be used? What new distortions and obstacles will the enemies of the Internet come up with?

Modern technology leads to the best and the worst. Extremist, racist and defamatory websites and blogs disseminate odious opinions in real time. They have made the Internet into a weapon of war and hate. Websites are attacked and Internet users are recruited through chatrooms for destructive plots. Violent movements are infiltrating social networks to spread propaganda and false information.

It is very hard for democracies to control them. I do not subscribe to the naïve belief that a new technology, however efficient and powerful it may be, is bound by nature to advance liberty on all fronts.

Yet, all the same, the distortions are the exception rather than the rule. The Internet is above all the most fantastic means of breaking down the walls and boundaries that close us off from each other. For the oppressed peoples, who have been deprived of their right to self-expression and the right to choose their own future, the Internet provides power beyond their wildest hopes. In minutes, news and images recorded on a telephone can be disseminated worldwide in cyberspace. It is increasingly difficult the hide a public demonstration, an act of repression or a violation of human rights.

In authoritarian and repressive countries, mobile telephones and the Internet have given rise to public opinion and civil society. They have also given citizens a critical means of expression, despite all the restrictions.

However, the temptation to repress free expression is always present. The number of countries that censor the Internet, that monitor web users and punish them for their opinions, is increasing at an alarming rate. The Internet can be used against citizens. It can be a formidable intelligence-gathering tool to spot potential dissidents. Some regimes are already acquiring increasingly sophisticated surveillance technology.

If all of those who are attached to human rights and democracy refused to compromise their principles and used the Internet to defend freedom of expression, this kind of repression would be much more difficult. I am not talking about absolute freedom that opens the door to all sorts of abuses. Nobody is promoting that. Instead, I'm talking about real freedom, which is based on the principle of respecting human dignity and human rights.

In the last few years, multilateral institutions, such as the Council of Europe, and non-governmental organisations, such as Reporters Without Borders, along with thousands of individuals around the world, have made a strong commitment to these issues. This is proof, if proof were needed, that this issue does not pit the West against the rest of the world. No fewer than 180 countries meeting for the World Summit on the Information Society acknowledged that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights applies fully to the Internet, especially Article 19, which establishes freedom of expression and freedom of opinion. And yet, some fifty countries fail to live up to their commitments.

For the occasion of World Press Freedom Day, I have brought together experts, NGO leaders, journalists, business people and intellectuals this week. Their discussions have confirmed my conviction that the path we want to take is the right one. I think that we should create an international instrument for monitoring the commitments that governments have made and for calling them to task when they fail to live up to them. I think we should provide assistance to cyberdissidents, who should get the same support as other victims of political repression, and of the need to show our solidarity with them publicly, in close collaboration with the NGOs working on these issues. I think that we should also discuss the wisdom of adopting a code of conduct regarding the export of technologies for censoring the Internet and tracking web users.

These issues, along with others, such as the protection of personal data on the Internet and the right of digital amnesty for everyone promoted by my colleague Nathalie Kosciusko-Morizet, should be addressed within a framework that brings together government, civil society and international experts.

Another project is close to my heart. It will be a long and difficult task to implement it, but it is critical. It is to give the Internet a legal status that reflects its universality. One that recognizes it as an international space, so that it will be more difficult for repressive governments to use the sovereignty argument against fundamental freedoms.

This is a critical issue. I think that the battle of ideas has started with, on one side, the advocates of a universal and open Internet, based on freedom of expression and freedom of association, on tolerance and respect for privacy and, on the other side, those who want to transform the Internet into a multitude of spaces that are closed off from each other to serve the purposes of a regime, propaganda and all forms of fanaticism.

Freedom of expression is "the foundation of all other freedoms". Without it, there are no "free nations", Voltaire said. This spirit of the Enlightenment, which is universal, should run through the new media. The defence of fundamental freedoms and human rights must be the priority for governance of the Internet. It is everyone's business.

Bernard Kouchner, Minister for Foreign and European Affairs

Hope you're both well. The DVD screener should arrive at Huma's sometime this morning.

I can't wait for to hear what you think of the film and, if you have the time, how we can strengthen themes and sections to make it a more relevant and effective educational and policy influencing tool. We are currently at various stages of reaching out or building partnerships with a wide variety of organizations from Facing History and Ourselves to JStreet to the Marine Corps to the United Nations (informally) to various think tanks, and human rights organizations.
We have big plans for the film and hope to use it as a platform to foster critical cross-cultural conversations.

And a disclaimer- the film is still a work in progress. We are drastically changing the intro, moving some sections around, and adding a story about the Marines sending senior Marine Officers to Jordan to negotiate and build partnerships with Al Anbar's exiled tribal leaders.

I am so excited for you to see it.

Have a safe trip, I hope to see you soon, and all the best,

Love,

FYI, from WHA:

Mexican law enforcement officials cannot stop individuals and require proof of migratory status. However, like SB1070, officials in the course of official "contact" (i.e. Traffic stops, investigations, hot pursuit) are authorized to request proof of migratory status. They do this in practice routinely. Frequently, individuals who cannot prove legal status are referred to INM (federal CBP-equivalent). In practice, GoM authorities at all levels engage in exploitative treatment of migrants, primarily Central Americans heading to the US. These abuses have been well documented by international human rights groups, as well as by multiple documentary and news media reports.

Tab A: Background and Positions

Background

In November 2009, the Department received a formal invitation from the Republic of Korea to participate in Expo 2012 Yeosu Korea. Large-scale expos, known as "registered expos," including Shanghai 2010, are held every five years; however, Yeosu is an off-year "recognized expo," and, as such, is shorter in length (three months duration), smaller in scale, and has a narrower theme than registered expos. To date, 35 countries have agreed to participate. The cost of U.S. participation has been tentatively estimated at $10-15 million.

Since 1994, when Congress legislated that the Department may not expend funds for international expos unless specifically authorized or appropriated, the U.S. has only participated in one off-year expo: Lisbon 1998. Funding for the off-year Lisbon expo came primarily through appropriated funds transferred to USIA from other federal government agencies, with the remainder coming from private sector contributions. In 1999, Congress tightened restrictions by further legislating that no funds made available to the Department by another federal agency may be obligated or expended for such expo purposes without prior congressional notification. Since then, 100% private sector funding has been sought for all U.S. Pavilions at world expos and no appropriations have been requested from Congress.

FYI, from WHA:

Mexican law enforcement officials cannot stop individuals and require proof of migratory status. However, like SB1070, officials in the course of official "contact" (i.e. Traffic stops, investigations, hot pursuit) are authorized to request proof of migratory status. They do this in practice routinely. Frequently, individuals who cannot prove legal status are referred to INM (federal CBP-equivalent). In practice, GoM authorities at all levels engage in exploitative treatment of migrants, primarily Central Americans heading to the US. These abuses have been well documented by international human rights groups, as well as by multiple documentary and news media reports.

Subject: Ecuador Stop

As we discussed in the trip meeting-- I feel that we might miss an important opportunity if we don't try to fit Ecuador into the Andean trip (Venezuela and Bolivia are out of the question). We could stop in Ecuador by leaving Peru early Tuesday morning after the OAS GA. The Secretary could deliver her speech in Ecuador, visit w the President and arrive in Colombia in the late afternoon. Delivering the speech in Quito would avoid upstaging the OASGA FMs in Lima.

The visit to Ecuador would advance already positive areas of cooperation, as well as underscore our desire to see Correa succeed in achieving constructive institutional reform, while respecting and preserving democratic governance. Correa's promise to reform Ecuador's political system and address social inequities resonates with a public disillusioned by decades of corruption and political instability. His agenda is principally driven by nationalism, not anti-Americanism, and although some of his economic policies mirror those of Venezuela, he is not following a recipe laid down by Chavez.

Despite its rhetoric, the Correa government has cooperated closely with the USG in many areas, including counter narcotics, anti-corruption, and alternative development assistance. Although Ecuador can be a challenging partner, our efforts to engage constructively with him are paying off. We had an excellent conversation during my April visit to Quito, including an open and candid conversation on sensitive issues like freedom of the press and maintaining a constructive dialogue with civil society. (The gift I gave him for his birthday, an edition of Living History signed by the Secretary, had a strong positive impact on him. He said that his mother-- who lived much of her life in California is a great admirer of the Secretary. ) Reporting after my meetings in Quito was very positive and seemed to indicate that Correa is ready to move beyond the stale rhetoric surrounding the Colombia Defense Cooperation Agreement. Indeed, there is a terrific opportunity to work tri-laterally with Peru, Ecuador and Colombia not only on counter drug matters-- but also on environmental issues like deforestation and climate change given the enormous extension of the amazon basin in those three countries. All three presidents welcomed the suggestion when I raised as a possibility. Working with them helps to pull Ecuador away from Venezuela while helping to improve cooperation w Colombia.

In sum, a visit to Ecuador would add a sub-regional theme to the trip, engaging with the Andean countries in Lima, Quito, and Bogota; and then with CARICOM in Barbados. The Secretary has been to Canada, Mexico, Central America, and the Southern Cone.

I heard a wonderful story last night praising Hillary Clinton for her work on behalf of children.

Last night I met Don Graves, he runs the Independent Living Skills Program (ILSP) in Contra Costa County. The program helps children in the foster care system, and among other things, teaches them skills needed to live on their own as adults.

Don told a heart-warming story of how then First Lady Hillary Clinton came out to visit with the kids in the program and hear their concerns. A major concern was that resources for kids coming out of foster care ended at age 18 and 6 months -- they needed more help. Within two years of the visit, President Clinton signed the Foster Care Independence Act, providing more money and more resources for ages 18 - 21. I think it is widely accepted that Hillary championed this legislation, and this was surely echoed by Don. He was beaming with admiration for her and what she accomplished to help the kids.

He went on to say that one of the participants in the program, Alfred Perez, who was part of the original discussion with the First Lady, was invited to the White House to see the bill signed. Alfred Perez later served on the Pew Commission on Foster care and is now teaching at the University of Chicago. http://www.ssa.uchicago.edu/faculty/ptlect/perez-a.shtml

THE SECRETARY OF STATE
WASHINGTON

April 20, 2010

The Honorable Kent Conrad, Chairman
Committee on the Budget
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am asking your help in supporting the State and USAID budget request for FY 2011. I appreciate the difficult budget environment that confronts the Congress, but I strongly believe this budget request is critical to advancing U.S. national security and our interests around the world.

Our request totals $52.8 billion – a $4.9 billion increase over 2010. Of that increase, $3.6 billion goes directly to "frontline states" – Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iraq. All other State and USAID funding grows by $1.3 billion or a 2.7 percent increase, and allows us to tackle the transnational problems of poverty, food insecurity, climate change, and disease that pose serious threats to American interests.

Our diplomatic and development tools enhance American leadership, strengthen our alliances, and build new partnerships to confront pressing global challenges. Full funding in FY 11 will allow us to continue making tangible progress in securing the hard fought gains achieved in Iraq, and to continue supporting and deploying hundreds of civilians in Afghanistan and Pakistan to help stabilize dangerous but improving situations.

The recent attacks on United States personnel and facilities from Juarez, Mexico, to Peshawar, Pakistan, reinforce what we already know – America's diplomats and development professionals are on the front lines, protecting, and securing our vital national security interests around the world.

Congress has rightly demanded that we use all the tools in our national security tool belt; that we put more diplomats and development experts on the ground, shoulder-to-shoulder with our troops; and that we do everything possible to secure America's interests around the world. We are doing our part at the State Department and USAID, but we need your help with the FY 11 request. Our missions are increasingly integrated with those of our Defense Department counterparts, as we have seen demonstrated time and again in Iraq, Afghanistan, and other parts of the world. Cuts to the civilian components can no longer be seen in isolation or having little impact on our national security strategy.

Our investments in development and diplomacy are smart, cost-effective, and squarely in the best interests of American taxpayers and our national security. They are also relatively small compared to the cost of active military engagement, and they can end up delivering impactful savings. In Iraq, for example, our $2.6 billion request for State and USAID will allow the Defense Department budget to decrease by about $16 billion – a powerful illustration of the return on civilian investments.

I ask for your strong support of our budget request and you have my pledge that we will work diligently to ensure that this funding is used as efficiently and effectively as possible.

Sincerely yours,

Hillary Rodham Clinton

The Gates-Clinton axis

By: Ben Smith and Jen DiMascio and Laura Rozen
May 24, 2010 04:50 AM EDT

The White House likes to release images of President Barack Obama at the head of the long Situation Room conference table, sober and experienced advisers lining either side.

But there is another meeting – with no cameras and no Obama – where the Cabinet's two most formidable figures seek to put their own stamp on the administration's national security agenda. It is the conversation Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton try to have each week when they're both in Washington, often in the company of National Security Adviser Jim Jones.

In an administration dominated by a powerful White House staff, Clinton and Gates have emerged as the giant exception and the only important center of gravity outside 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

Their close relationship has been central to the unusual degree of agreement on critical issues, most notably the Afghan surge but also a range of other initiatives, from increasing the size of the State Department's foreign aid budget to imposing new sanctions on Iran.

"It's a phalanx," former Pentagon official Leslie Gelb said of the Clinton-Gates alliance. "I can't remember a really important issue where they have disagreed. They are both center-right; they have their four feet firmly planted on that ground. And that is, they are not going to open themselves up to serious attack from the right, whether it's Iraq or Afghanistan or Iran or you name it."

Gates, known inside the White House as "Yoda," is unquestionably the most powerful member of the Obama Cabinet — the only one with the muscle to push back. Clinton, meanwhile, is the most popular, her approval ratings cruising well above Obama's own. An alliance is good for each of them.

Clinton saves Gates from political isolation as a Republican in a Democratic administration and has signed on to a policy agenda he has set, adding her voice to his demands for more troops and her department's civilian resources to the war in Afghanistan.

Gates, for his part, has saved Clinton from a different kind of marginalization by a powerful White House staff, which has a sometimes-rocky relationship with her own staff of loyalists, a residue of thebitter 2008 campaign. He's offered her a potent back channel to power and — some of her most political allies have told other Democrats — a path forward inside the administration.

Gates, who has long signaled an eagerness to retire, just launched what appears to be his final initiative, a tough push to scale back the Pentagon's gargantuan bureaucracy. Clinton, with her hawkish image and ties to Gates and to military brass, would be his most logical successor — and some of her most senior allies have begun quietly to float the notion.

The two meet regularly, though talk of weekly lunches was disrupted by the aggressive travel schedules both keep. They most recently lunched together April 26 at the State Department, a source said, but meet almost weekly, along with Jones, at the White House. The two are said to be personally compatible. Both, one source noted, are Midwestern United Methodists.

Connecticut Rep. John Larson, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said Gates and Clinton have briefed the caucus three times together and present a united front. "The overlap and the ease which they transition from point to point — very notable," he said. "We have all Cabinet members move through the caucus. It's not always so notable that they transition from point to point, seamlessly and are on the same page."

Such a close alliance between the two leading members of a modern president's Cabinet is hardly typical.

"A lot of presidents have had to spend quite a bit of time adjudicating disputes between the Pentagon and Foggy Bottom," said Strobe Talbott, a State Department official under President Bill Clinton.

More often, they're fighting their own wars. Some of the deepest intramural hatreds in American government have run across the Potomac, a tradition embodied most recently by Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell, secretaries of defense and state in the administration of President George W. Bush, who famously did not get along.

"My sense is that each of them understands the way in which the other one's function can help advance the cause," said Talbott. "Bob Gates totally understands the need for a very proactive and well-funded development policy in order to keep weak states from becoming failed states."

The relationship is, indeed, part of a pattern for Gates, one that's made him one of the most successful and enduring government officials of the past half-century. A career CIA analyst who served as deputy national security adviser under Brent Scowcroft in the George H.W. Bush White House before becoming the first career officer to lead the spy agency, Gates spent 13 years in academia before being named Rumsfeld's successor in 2006.

Still, those who know Gates worried that after Obama made the surprise decision to keep him on at the Pentagon, he would inevitably be an outlier in a Democratic administration. But the quick bond he formed with Hillary Clinton and others were part of a familiar strategy.

"He's by nature an alliance builder," said a senior official from the Bush and Clinton administrations.

Gates did not have a relationship with George W. Bush either when he took over from Rumsfeld in 2006. But he had worked with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Stephen Hadley, Rice's successor as national security adviser during Bush's administration. That helped him get along in the Cabinet, and he didn't stop there.

In contrast to Rumsfeld, who was dismissive of Capitol Hill, Gates courted key members of Congress, particularly Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. After Levin brought up concerns about confirming Marine Gen. Peter Pace for a second two-year term as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gates pulled back on the nomination.

He has followed that pattern in the Obama administration. When Jones was taking knocks in the press for being less powerful than his top deputies, Gates called on Washington Post columnist David Ignatius, to defend Jones — a fellow supporter of the military and someone in his age bracket — as "the glue that holds this team together," a dexterous bit of politics that allowed him to do Jones a favor while simultaneous capitalizing on what's perceived as his bureaucratic weakness.

Some of Gates's admirers see the relationship with Hillary Clinton in a similar light and argue that he's been able to use her to achieve his policy goals — and not vice versa.

"The reality is that no one, including the White House, is willing to cross Gates because we desperately need him for political cover on everything, whether it be defense budget reform, arms control or[Afghanistan and Pakistan] and Iraq," a Democratic foreign policy official said, challenging a reporter to "name me one issue where [Clinton] had a strong viewpoint and then successfully maneuvered the administration in her direction."

Pentagon spokesman Geoff Morrell dismissed the notion that Gates has used Clinton to his advantage as "complete nonsense."

"Is this a mutually beneficial relationship? Sure, everyone benefits when the secretaries of state and defense have a good working relationship. Are they using each other to advance personal agendas? Absolutely not," he said. "They happen to be very like-minded on many issues. She is, as he often says, very 'tough-minded' — and he respects that about her. I know it's not very juicy, but there's no secret alliance here. The fact is they simply see eye to eye more often than not."

Clinton, too, has experience in navigating the highest levels and of building unlikely alliances.

"This replicates one of her most effective moves in the Senate, which was to figure out who the power brokers were, study up on them and make sure she could work effectively with them," said Heather Hurlburt, executive director of the National Security Network, a Democratic group.

And if Gates has been a behind-the-scenes architect of policy, Clinton's role is more public: She is "one of the articulators of the overall strategy that we adopted" on Iran and China, Jones recently told Newsweek.

Some critics of Obama's policy, though, see the two hawks as having pulled the president to the right. The two were particularly instrumental in making the case internally for an Afghan troop surge, and they were close enough to sell it jointly, appearing together on television to defend the plan.

Just last week, Clinton and Gates testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to validate the administration's commitment to modernize the nation's nuclear arsenal, and to preserve the ability to design new warhead components if needed.

The administration's stance was a victory for Gates, as the Pentagon appears to have fought hard to keep the nuclear capacity — reportedly over the objections of other members of the administration's inner circle, including Vice President Joe Biden.

Ironically, close observers say, the chief diplomat has emerged, if anything, as blunter and more hawkish than the diplomatic secretary of defense. After an attempted bombing in New York's Times Square appeared to have links to the Pakistani Taliban, Clinton publicly warned of "very severe consequences" should an attack be traced back to Pakistan.

Gates took a far milder line.

"It's their country," he said. "They remain in the driver's seat, and they have their foot on the accelerator."

Subject: Update on your trip to Doha

Judith,

Below is a rough outline of your trip to Doha, as it currently stands.

LOGISTICS:

You are currently scheduled to arrive in Doha on May 1 at 6:30 and depart May 2 at 7 pm. Traveling with you will be Kitty DiMartino, Joe Mellott, Mark Davidson, and GSEC's LTC Eric Schoennauer. Dana Smith will fly in from the Media Hub in Dubai to meet you in Doha.

Key events:

Dinner with Al Jazeera (AJ) staff: AJ Director General Wadah Khanfar will host a dinner on May 1 with senior AJ staff, including AJ English Managing Director Tony Burman. We expect 7 people on the AJ side and 6 on ours. (The dinner is schedule for 8pm in a private room in the Four Seasons; post is making reservations for the party to stay in the same hotel.)

Meeting with AJ Board Members at AJ Headquarters: This will give you an opportunity to engage the Qatari leadership of the network. Discussions topics should include the mid-May Washington visit by some AJ Board representatives. We expect Wadah Khanfar to also participate in this meeting.

(TBC) Meeting with Prime Minister Hamad bin Jasim bin Jabir al-Thani (HBJ): As PM, HBJ is the ultimate Qatari authority on AJ. The meeting will also allow you to raise bi-lateral engagement issues as necessary. We expect to know in a few days if HBJ will be available.

Meetings with CENTCOM: You will meet with CENTCOM staff at Al Udeid airbase just outside of Doha. They will brief you on their [redacted] within their AOR, but with particular focus on activities in [redacted] B1 1.4(D)

MEDIA:

Feature on AJ Arabic: 15 minute "feature" piece filmed at AJ Studios on the Administration's commitment to engagement with Muslim communities worldwide. This will be a good opportunity to highlight the Entrepreneurship Summit. We can expect you to also get questions on PD programs in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iraq. You will be interviewed by one of AJ's "top" journalists; exactly who is still to be determined. The interview will be in English with simultaneous interpretation into Arabic. It will likely air a number of times on AJ.

Feature on AJ English: This would be a second 15 minute "feature" piece similar to the one for AJ Arabic. If we are pressed for time we can consider just doing the AJ Arabic feature.

Roundtable with local Qatari media: This will include journalists from a number of local Qatari media outlets. This is another opportunity to talk about the Administration's commitment to engagement, but with a more targeted focus on bilateral engagement and exchange programs.

Note – Wadah Khanfar has been closely engaged on, if not driving, the portions of your program that deal with AJ. Post reports that he is very pleased to have this opportunity for you to engage with AJ leadership in Doha.

Best,

Ann

Nelson to back 'Don't ask' repeal
By: Jen DiMascio
May 26, 2010 12:08 PM EDT

Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson (D) will back repeal of don't ask don't tell, likely putting repeal proponents over the top in their quest to end the ban on gays serving openly in the military.

"I don't believe that most Nebraskans want to continue a policy that not only encourages but requires people to be deceptive and to lie. The 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' policy does just that," Nelson said. "It also encourages suspicion and senior officers to look the other way. In a military which values honesty and integrity, this policy encourages deceit."

"I will support the Lieberman compromise because it removes politics from the process. It bases implementation of the repeal on the Pentagon's review and a determination by our military leaders that repeal is consistent with military readiness and effectiveness, and that the Pentagon has prepared the necessary regulations to make the changes," he said, adding that he spoke with Defense Secretary Robert Gates about the issue.

"He advised that while he preferred waiting until the study is completed, he can live with this compromise," Nelson said.

Given statements made by Sens. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) that they, too, will vote for repeal, Nebraska's Nelson would be the critical 15th vote required for repeal to be included in the defense authorization bill.

Their decisions were also made after earlier news this week that both the White House and Gates could live with a compromise amendment sponsored by Sens. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.).

"We thank Senator Nelson for his support and are extremely grateful. He and other senators supporting repeal will be on the right side of history," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign. "While Senator Nelson's vote is critical, no vote will be taken for granted in these final hours before the Senate committee vote."

The political genius of supply-side economics

Martin Wolf
Financial Times

July 25, 2010 4:18pm | Share

The future of fiscal policy was intensely debated in the FT last week. In this Exchange, I want to examine what is going on in the US and, in particular, what is going on inside the Republican party. This matters for the US and, because the US remains the world's most important economy, it also matters greatly for the world.

My reading of contemporary Republican thinking is that there is no chance of any attempt to arrest adverse long-term fiscal trends should they return to power. Moreover, since the Republicans have no interest in doing anything sensible, the Democrats will gain nothing from trying to do much either. That is the lesson Democrats have to draw from the Clinton era's successful frugality, which merely gave George W. Bush the opportunity to make massive (irresponsible and unsustainable) tax cuts. In practice, then, nothing will be done.

Indeed, nothing may be done even if a genuine fiscal crisis were to emerge. According to my friend, Bruce Bartlett, a highly informed, if jaundiced, observer, some "conservatives" (in truth, extreme radicals) think a federal default would be an effective way to bring public spending they detest under control. It should be noted, in passing, that a federal default would surely create the biggest financial crisis in world economic history.

To understand modern Republican thinking on fiscal policy, we need to go back to perhaps the most politically brilliant (albeit economically unconvincing) idea in the history of fiscal policy: "supply-side economics". Supply-side economics liberated conservatives from any need to insist on fiscal rectitude and balanced budgets. Supply-side economics said that one could cut taxes and balance budgets, because incentive effects would generate new activity and so higher revenue. The political genius of this idea is evident. Supply-side economics transformed Republicans from a minority party into a majority party. It allowed them to promise lower taxes, lower deficits and, in effect, unchanged spending. Why should people not like this combination? Who does not like a free lunch?

How did supply-side economics bring these benefits? First, it allowed conservatives to ignore deficits. They could argue that, whatever the impact of the tax cuts in the short run, they would bring the budget back into balance, in the longer run. Second, the theory gave an economic justification – the argument from incentives - for lowering taxes on politically important supporters. Finally, if deficits did not, in fact, disappear, conservatives could fall back on the "starve the beast" theory: deficits would create a fiscal crisis that would force the government to cut spending and even destroy the hated welfare state.

In this way, the Republicans were transformed from a balanced-budget party to a tax-cutting party. This innovative stance proved highly politically effective, consistently putting the Democrats at a political disadvantage. It also made the Republicans de facto Keynesians in a de facto Keynesian nation. Whatever the rhetoric, I have long considered the US the advanced world's most Keynesian nation – the one in which government (including the Federal Reserve) is most expected to generate healthy demand at all times, largely because jobs are, in the US, the only safety net for those of working age.

True, the theory that cuts would pay for themselves has proved altogether wrong. That this might well be the case was evident: cutting tax rates from, say, 30 per cent to zero would unambiguously reduce revenue to zero. This is not to argue there were no incentive effects. But they were not large enough to offset the fiscal impact of the cuts (see, on this, Wikipedia and a nice chart from Paul Krugman).

Indeed, Greg Mankiw, no less, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under George W. Bush, has responded to the view that broad-based tax cuts would pay for themselves, as follows: "I did not find such a claim credible, based on the available evidence. I never have, and I still don't." Indeed, he has referred to those who believe this as "charlatans and cranks". Those are his words, not mine, though I agree. They apply, in force, to contemporary Republicans, alas,

Since the fiscal theory of supply-side economics did not work, the tax-cutting eras of Ronald Reagan and George H. Bush and again of George W. Bush saw very substantial rises in ratios of federal debt to gross domestic product. Under Reagan and the first Bush, the ratio of public debt to GDP went from 33 per cent to 64 per cent. It fell to 57 per cent under Bill Clinton. It then rose to 69 per cent under the second George Bush. Equally, tax cuts in the era of George W. Bush, wars and the economic crisis account for almost all the dire fiscal outlook for the next ten years (see the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities).

Today's extremely high deficits are also an inheritance from Bush-era tax-and-spending policies and the financial crisis, also, of course, inherited by the present administration. Thus, according to the International Monetary Fund, the impact of discretionary stimulus on the US fiscal deficit amounts to a cumulative total of 4.7 per cent of GDP in 2009 and 2010, while the cumulative deficit over these years is forecast at 23.5 per cent of GDP. In any case, the stimulus was certainly too small, not too large.

The evidence shows, then, that contemporary conservatives (unlike those of old) simply do not think deficits matter, as former vice-president Richard Cheney is reported to have told former treasury secretary Paul O'Neill. But this is not because the supply-side theory of self-financing tax cuts, on which Reagan era tax cuts were justified, has worked, but despite the fact it has not. The faith has outlived its economic (though not its political) rationale.

So, when Republicans assail the deficits under President Obama, are they to be taken seriously? Yes and no. Yes, they are politically interested in blaming Mr Obama for deficits, since all is viewed fair in love and partisan politics. And yes, they are, indeed, rhetorically opposed to deficits created by extra spending (although that did not prevent them from enacting the unfunded prescription drug benefit, under President Bush). But no, it is not deficits themselves that worry Republicans, but rather how they are caused: deficits caused by tax cuts are fine; but spending increases brought in by Democrats are diabolical, unless on the military.

Indeed, this is precisely what John Kyl (Arizona), a senior Republican senator, has just said:

> "[Y]ou should never raise taxes in order to cut taxes. Surely Congress has the authority, and it would be right to — if we decide we want to cut taxes to spur the economy, not to have to raise taxes in order to offset those costs. You do need to offset the cost of increased spending, and that's what Republicans object to. But you should never have to offset the cost of a deliberate decision to reduce tax rates on Americans"

What conclusions should outsiders draw about the likely future of US fiscal policy?

First, if Republicans win the mid-terms in November, as seems likely, they are surely going to come up with huge tax cut proposals (probably well beyond extending the already unaffordable Bush-era tax cuts).

Second, the White House will probably veto these cuts, making itself even more politically unpopular.

Third, some additional fiscal stimulus is, in fact, what the US needs, in the short term, even though across-the-board tax cuts are an extremely inefficient way of providing it.

Fourth, the Republican proposals would not, alas, be short term, but dangerously long term, in their impact.

Finally, with one party indifferent to deficits, provided they are brought about by tax cuts, and the other party relatively fiscally responsible (well, everything is relative, after all), but opposed to spending cuts on core programmes, US fiscal policy is paralysed. I may think the policies of the UK government dangerously austere, but at least it can act.

This is extraordinarily dangerous. The danger does not arise from the fiscal deficits of today, but the attitudes to fiscal policy, over the long run, of one of the two main parties. Those radical conservatives (a small minority, I hope) who want to destroy the credit of the US federal government may succeed. If so, that would be the end of the US era of global dominance. The destruction of fiscal credibility could be the outcome of the policies of the party that considers itself the most patriotic.

In sum, a great deal of trouble lies ahead, for the US and the world.

Palestinian President Abbas said he was ready for direct negotiations with Israel, following Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's accusations that the Palestinians are avoiding the talks. "We are ready to hold direct peace negotiations with Israel," Abbas told reporters after talks with Jordan's King Abdullah II in Amman. "We have negotiated with Israeli governments before, more than once. Why would we avoid such talks? We are not."
Netanyahu told the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs and defense earlier July 26 the Palestinians were trying to sneak out of direct negotiations while Israel was ready to start them "immediately." "We have an understanding with the Americans that we need to move now, without any delay, to direct negotiations, but in response, we have a clear Palestinian attempt to avoid this process," Netanyahu said. "They are trying to stall and to sneak away from direct negotiations and to cause the Arab League to shackle the talks."
Netanyahu's remarks come just days ahead of a meeting in Cairo between Abbas and the Arab League at which the Palestinian leader will discuss the indirect talks with Israel, which began in May, and will also address the pressing question of a shift to direct negotiations.
Abbas has repeatedly said he would not move to direct talks without tangible progress on the key issues of borders and security, and without a complete freeze on Jewish settlement building on occupied Palestinian land.
Abbas is due to meet Spanish Foreign Minister Moratinos July 27 in Amman before flying to Cairo.

RIYADH (Reuters) - Saudi ruler King Abdullah meets Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad on July 29 to try to ease tensions in Lebanon, capitalizing on an apparent weakening in Iran's position after a round of tough new sanctions. The monarch will hold talks with Assad in Damascus before heading to Beirut where he will meet his ally Premier Saad al-Hariri, President Michel Suleiman and pro-Western Lebanese political leaders, Saudi officials said. The monarch hopes to convince Assad to accompany him to Beirut from Damascus, Lebanese officials say, although Syria has not confirmed that Assad will oblige.

WASHINGTON (AP) - A senior Democratic senator is largely dismissing the significance of classified U.S. military documents released over the weekend that portrayed a range of problems in the Afghan war. At a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, the panel's chairman, Senator John Kerry (D-MA), said people should not "overhype or get excessively excited about" the disclosures. He said the release was unlawful and could potentially endangered U.S. troops in Afghanistan. But he also said the secret documents should be given little weight because in many cases they reflect raw intelligence, not carefully calibrated assessments of trends on the ground. Kerry's committee is holding a hearing on the prospects for achieving a reconciliation between the Afghan government and the Taliban insurgency.

FISA director leaves legacy of collaboration

Breaking down barriers

Wednesday, May 26, 2010

By Tina Calabro, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pam Panchak/Post-Gazette

FISA Foundation retiring executive director Dee Delaney, left, with the new executive director, Kristy Trautmann.

To people in the local disability community, Dee Delaney is a household name.

When news came this spring of her intention to retire as executive director of FISA Foundation in August, one could almost hear a collective gasp. With 14 years at the helm of the small but influential foundation, Ms. Delaney has had a pronounced and lasting influence on quality of life in our region.

On behalf of FISA, Ms. Delaney has changed the local landscape not only by funding projects with far-reaching results, but by bringing people together to craft solutions to longstanding problems and by becoming personally involved in many of the projects the foundation funds.

She became the first executive director of FISA Foundation when it began in 1996 with proceeds from the sale of Harmarville Rehabilitation Center, a nonprofit, to HealthSouth, a for-profit organization.

The new foundation would continue the mission of the Federation of Independent School Alumnae, an organization that opened a convalescent home for women in 1911 and the Harmarville Rehabilitation Center in 1954. That mission was to improve the lives of women, girls and people with disabilities in Western Pennsylvania.

Ms. Delaney, who had been involved with Harmarville since 1980 -- starting as a volunteer and ending as development director of its foundation -- sought the job of leading FISA. "I realized the impact the foundation could have. FISA is not a large foundation, but it's a very focused foundation," she said.

Over the past 14 years, FISA's endowment has grown to more than $38 million. Over $17 million has been granted to 726 projects in 298 organizations.

A roll call of projects funded by FISA reflects progressive thinking about including of people with disabilities in all aspects of life, especially access to health care. Programs have become national models.

Women with disabilities, for example, often encounter barriers in typical healthcare settings. Standard exam tables and diagnostic equipment were designed for the able-bodied, and medical staff often struggle to accommodate individuals with special needs. FISA provided the seed money for the Center for Women with Disabilities at Magee-Womens Hospital of UPMC, one of the first such clinics in the nation. FISA is involved in the overall issue of improving access to healthcare for people with disabilities.

Likewise, people with disabilities have difficulty obtaining dental care. A FISA-funded project at Achieva is creating statewide, systemic solutions. FISA also provided support for the Center for Patients with Special Needs at Pitt's School of Dental Medicine.

FISA has also taken the lead on training arts and cultural venues how to make events more accessible and helping places of worship more welcoming.

"Dee is a national leader in the field. If there were more people like her, we wouldn't have the issues we have," said Kim Hutchinson, executive director of the Disability Funders Network, based in Virginia. Ms. Delaney has been a board officer for the group since 2004.

Nancy Murray, president of the ARC of Greater Pittsburgh, said the issues Ms. Delaney has helped solve are ones that people have been working on for years.

"People talk about strategies, but never move forward to solutions. Dee brings all the stakeholders together to get to the solutions," said Ms. Murray.

"I think Dee has greatly influenced the next generation of nonprofit and philanthropic leaders, leading by example on the value of true collaboration," said Susie Chase, a board member of FISA and former executive director of Working Order, a FISA grantee.

"With Dee, it is never about her own role, or FISA's role, it is always about unmet needs in the community and the work that needs to be done. That seems to bring out the best in every partner, and in everyone who has the privilege of working with her."

Ms. Chase added that advice and technical assistance Ms. Delaney provided to Working Order "were of equal or greater value to the organization than the grant funds."

"I still, after many years, never come away from a meeting with Dee that I haven't learned something, been inspired to work harder, and understood more clearly the value of someone else's ideas and efforts."

In her retirement, Ms. Delaney plans to "give back to the community in new ways," she said. A new frontier is helping young people with disabilities prepare for employment and leadership. "We have to keep the fire burning."

On May 19, FISA announced that Kristy Trautmann, who has served as the foundation's program director for six years, was promoted to executive director.

"We sought a person who would follow Ms. Delaney's visionary leadership and guide the foundation into the next decade," said Jane Burger, who chaired the search committee. "We know that we have found such a person in Kristy Trautmann. She understands the challenges facing the populations the foundation supports and has the trust of the board and the community."

George Richert
May 25, 2010 6:00 p.m.

A new Buffalo Bill is catching the world's attention.

On the practice field Tuesday afternoon, he was just another Bill, a rookie no less, but he's catching a lot of attention in his family's homeland.

In China this week, during a speech to dignitaries at the USA Pavilion, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said this:

"From Yo-Yo Ma to I.M. Pei to Commerce Secretary Gary Locke and Energy Secretary Chu, Chinese-Americans have achieved great success in business, government, the arts, sciences and sports. And to that end, I was pleased to hear that the Buffalo Bills have recently drafted the first Chinese-American to play in the NFL," said Clinton.

Buffalo Bills offensive tackle Ed Wang said, "It felt good. She's a very important person, and so for someone like that to talk about me, it just feels good."

Wang didn't know until he heard from News 4 that he was mentioned in Shanghai. The 6'5", 250 pound Bills rookie wasn't born in China, but both of his parents were Chinese Olympians in track and field, so he loves breaking new ground in football.

>>>In George's reporter's notebook, he explains why the Buffalo Bills limit media access to the first 15 minutes of practice

"It is important to me just because I am the first, and I take a lot of pride in being Chinese, but at the same time, I know that I'm out here to play football," said Wang.

Wang is expected to make the team, and his goal is to make a difference.

MENENDEZ – JOINED BY LAUTENBERG, GILLIBRAND AND SCHUMER – ANNOUNCES NEW PLAN TO GET ANSWERS ABOUT LOCKERBIE BOMBER RELEASE

Investigation will be launched to gather new information, Senate hearing date will be re-set

WASHINGTON – U.S. Senator Robert Menendez (D-NJ), who will chair a Foreign Relations Committee hearing on the release of the Pan Am Flight 103 bomber, today was joined by Senators Frank Lautenberg (D-NJ), Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) and Charles Schumer (D-NY) in announcing a new plan to gather critical information on the issue. Because the key Scottish government, British government and BP witnesses declined to testify at the hearing scheduled for Thursday, Menendez and his colleagues announced that the hearing date will be re-set and that they will work with the Foreign Relations Committee to launch an investigation into the matter and provide the basis for the re-scheduled hearing.

Senator Menendez explained the new plan: "We are at a place where no witness of consequence has the courage to step forward and clear the air – they would prefer to sweep this under the rug. Because of this stonewalling, we are shifting our efforts to a longer-term, multi-dimensional inquiry into the release of al-Megrahi. The hearing will be postponed and rescheduled, and it will be coupled with an investigation into al-Megrahi's release. In declining our witness request, the Scottish government did offer to provide answers to further questions we may have. We appreciate that, and will take them up on that offer. We will work with the Foreign Relations Committee to launch the investigation into this matter – asking the pointed questions that we would have in person, and requesting additional documents. Our requests will be frequent and public – we don't intend for this issue to be forgotten or swept under the rug. When our information is more complete, we will release it publicly, hold the hearing and discuss what we have found."

Senator Lautenberg said: "I will not rest until there is a clear and credible record of what led to the early release of the Lockerbie bomber. In the last year, troubling questions surrounding the circumstances of al-Megrahi's release have come to the surface. The families of the victims of Pan Am 103 have already suffered so much, and the release of this convicted terrorist has only amplified their anguish and grief. For their sake, we must get to the bottom of these questions. Those who commit vicious acts of terrorism have to know that they will be punished without compassion, and a rigorous investigation will help send that message."

Senator Gillibrand said: "It has become clear that there is a great deal of information already in the public domain that has not been fully investigated. Already we have seen an abundance of circumstantial evidence that justice and the international fight against terror were compromised to serve the interests of BP and possibly other companies. The only independent review of this matter was done by the Scottish Parliament, which said they were 'extremely concerned' about the basis on which compassionate release was granted. The Scottish review was also limited in scope and did not examine the external influences on Al-Megrahi's release. Our investigation will review past evidence and new information that we intend to gather in a new light, so that we can answer questions about whether BP tried to free Al-Megrahi. What has happened here is a total miscarriage of justice. Al-Megrahi should never have been released, and we must answer exactly why this happened."

Senator Schumer said: "It is time for the UK and Scottish Governments to prove they are part of the solution here and not part of the problem. Day after day, week after week, more and more questions get raised and we need all parties to this controversy involved in answering them. We will continue in our quest for the truth so that justice can be served and the families of the victims can have their faith in the legal process restored."

Invited to the hearing, but declining to appear were: Scottish Justice Secretary Kenny MacAskill (made the decision to release al-Megrahi), Dr. Andrew Fraser (Scottish prison system doctor cited by MacAskill as responsible for the medical prognosis that led to the release), Jack Straw, the former British Justice Secretary (has acknowledged that his government pushed for al-Megrahi's release as part of a prisoner transfer agreement), BP CEO Tony Hayward (directly involved in negotiations with Libya), and Sir Mark Allen (former British MI6 hired by BP and acted as a liaison between the company and the Libyan and British governments).

FYI – the Senate is likely to pass the supp tonight. And, no nominees from any government agency will be confirmed tonight or tomorrow. Would like to discuss the potential for recess appointments with you and Cheryl.

The Brookings event, especially your opening remarks, were excellent. Very thoughtful, with lots of real-life examples. We have gotten lots of positive feedback.

Yes Haiti money was in.

Also had a good meeting with corker and isakson. They liked our negotiating record summary, but they don't want to vote on the treaty in committee next week. Looks like we are headed for september for committee and hopefully floor action as well.

AMMAN (AFP) - Jordanian Prime Minister Samir Rifai reshuffled his cabinet on July 28, dropping six ministers and replacing them with seven others. The ministers of justice, education, agriculture, tourism, information and cabinet affairs left the government, while Labour Minister Ibrahim Omush changed his portfolio to become state minister for prime ministry and legal affairs. Seven new members entered the government, after they were sworn in by King Abdullah II.

I am headed back from China and I do not have S' email but I wanted to pass on this info regarding Father Charlie Beirne, a friend to both of us and frmr Prez of LeMoyne College who is now at a hospice at Fordham University in the Bronx. He greatly admires S and they always had a special relationship. We had planned for him to come down and have lunch w us (incldg Mark Landler of the NYT who I have informed).

Charlie called me last night and he is stoic and brave but I think he would appreciate a call from S - who is simply admires

This is a Jesuit that showed his bravery by calling the Secy General of the Jesuits to ask to replace his Jesuit friend who had been massacred (along w others) by the military at a University in Central America.

I am writing to share an update on Fr. Beirne's health. Fr. Beirne called this morning to let me know that his cancer has reached a stage where he has made the decision not to have any further clinical intervention. He prefers to live out the time he has remaining, six months by the doctors' projections, without the sapping of his energy and other side effects posed by his recent treatments. I have his permission to share this sad news with you. You may write to Fr. Beirne at Murray-Weigel Hall where he is now living (see address below) or phone him on his cell phone at [redacted]

Sanger has a blog item on the NYT site about the comment, but more of a political take in that if you run for president again your opponents will pull the Brookings tape. And a couple of wingnut blogs asking why you don't just volunteer more of your own money to taxes, and that you chose Brazil as a "socialist country that sides with our enemies as a model.". But frankly, I had to look pretty hard to find that, I was the 19th person to read it. Not 19,000th. 19th.

Most coverage was either straightforward about the NSS, or your comments about the debt as a national security problem.

Subject: FW: SRB op-ed in Wash Post Outlook section Sunday

HRC: Below is an oped on the National Security Strategy I wrote for tomorrow's Outlook.

Unfortunately, they give it a horrible title, but I think the piece turned out alright.

Best, Sandy

By Samuel R. Berger

Samuel R. Berger, chair of the global strategy firm Albright Stonebridge Group, served as national security advisor to President Clinton from 1997 to 2001.

President Obama's National Security Strategy, released by the White House on Thursday, tackles a delicate but unavoidable question: How do we respond to new and old security challenges in an era of financial distress at home and a reordering of political power abroad?

For some time now, it has been clear that the definition of U.S. national security strategy needs rethinking. The September 11 attacks, global economic crisis, cyber-terror threats and even the environmental catastrophe in the Gulf underscore that the challenges America faces in 2010 have changed even from just a decade ago. And while America's military supremacy is certainly not at risk, new international arrangements - such as the shift from the G-7 club of powerful nations to the G-20, which incorporates emerging nations from China to Brazil - are needed so that the costs and benefits of a stable international order are shared. The United States cannot solve most global threats without others, nor should we bear the burden alone.

Enter the National Security Strategy. In my experience, these congressionally mandated documents can easily become laborious and impenetrable, or mere compendiums of bureaucratic pleading from various parts of the government. (Make sure you do right by Japan! Don't step on the Pentagon!) The challenge, which President Clinton insisted upon to me and his other advisers, is to provide a strategic framework that is clarifying to the rest of the world and informs administration decision makers up and down the line. It's not a blueprint for action, but a means to convey the president's principles and priorities.

In Obama's case, the new sober and comprehensive 52-page strategy incorporates the new realities and breaks with past strategies in several key respects. But it also reflects an understanding that we face enduring challenges - nuclear proliferation, terrorism and regional conflicts - for which the best response is a return to fundamentals.

One such fundamental is the strength of our economy. At a time when the after-effects of a financial crisis and the fiscal burden of two long wars have raised fears of an overextended America, the administration makes a case for economic and technological renewal as a crucial underpinning of U.S. security. The president made this case in his West Point speech last weekend. "At no time in human history," he said, "has a nation of diminished economic vitality maintained its military and political primacy."

Another fundamental challenge is arms control and nuclear proliferation. By seeking strategic arms cuts with Russia, the president has returned to a long bipartisan tradition that languished during the prior administration. And by convening a global summit on securing nuclear material this spring, Obama has given new urgency and global purchase to the effort started in 1991 when Sens. Sam Nunn and Richard Lugar first initiated a program to lock down nuclear materials.

On terrorism, the strategy builds on the past, but breaks with it as well. Presidents Clinton, Bush and Obama each have deployed all of America's tools: military power, homeland defense, law enforcement, sanctions, intelligence and vigorous efforts to cut off terrorist financing. But the critical difference in the Obama strategy is that it rejects the Global War on Terror lens through which the prior administration viewed the challenge. "This is not a global war against a tactic - terrorism - or a religion - Islam," the new strategy says. "We are at war with a specific network, al-Qaeda and its terrorist affiliates."

This sharper focus avoids alienating many in the Muslim world, ensures the support of key allies who never accepted the broader construct and avoids the overreactions that led us to forsake the fight against al-Qaeda fight in Afghanistan and turn our efforts to the unrelated threat from Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

In perhaps the most dramatic departure from the strategy of its predecessor, the Obama administration has restored a less provocative policy on the use of military force. In the 2002 national security strategy, President Bush articulated the rationale for preemptive war just weeks before seeking a U.N. resolution to invade Iraq. The new strategy restores the principles that have guided administrations for decades: the use of force should be a last resort, should weigh all the costs and benefits, and should have as much international support as possible. The administration reserves the right to act unilaterally - for example against al-Qaeda and its allies - but resurrects the principle President Clinton often described as "together where possible, alone where necessary."

President Obama's critics have focused on his diplomatic engagement with hostile states like Iran and North Korea. The President sets forth his rationale: "to create opportunities to resolve differences, strengthen the international community's support for our actions, learn about the intentions and nature of closed regimes, and plainly demonstrate to the public within those nations that their governments are to blame for their isolation."
In the case of Iran, Washington's outstretched hand has not resulted in Iran's compliance. But attempts to engage have helped ensure that the world's attention is focused on Iran's intransigence rather than Washington's refusal to negotiate.

Without a doubt, there are gaps between principle and practice. Despite the Obama administration's stated goal of doubling exports in the next five years, it has not put its muscle behind trade agreements with South Korea, Panama and Colombia. And the clarity of its call to respect human rights has at times been muted in the face of tough realities. Sixteen months into this administration there has been much progress, but many of the true tests of this strategy lie ahead.

In the strategy's conclusions, the Obama administration evokes an even earlier era, calling for both political parties to restore the cooperation and common purpose so crucial to our success during the dark days of the Cold War. Despite the intense debates at the time over nuclear arms control, Central America and détente, nearly all American supported the containment of communism.

In that same spirit, the administration's framework deserves broad bipartisan support. We can and should argue out our differences over detention of prisoners, methods to disarm dangerous states, how hard to push for democratic rights, or the costs of climate change legislation. But at the same time, we can rally around the overriding U.S. foreign policy goals spelled out in the strategy: renewing our economy at home to ensure leadership abroad; defeating al-Qaeda; succeeding in Afghanistan; preventing nuclear proliferation; curbing climate change; and promoting an international order of enlightened self-interest, economic prosperity and the fundamental values upon which America is based.

It took a little bit to figure out, but turns out that O'Reilly didn't have a new show last night - in its place they re-aired the show from May 17th, the original night Posner got beat up. I guess O'Reilly is taking a 4-day weekend, don't ask me why they picked that show to air in its place. So you were watching a repeat:

This is from Fr. Borys Gudziak, the wonderful priest you met in Lviv. He gave you a tour of the Cathedral and you had a wonderful chat with him at the time. Since then, much progress has been made there. He became head of the new Ukrainian Catholic University and has really come in to his own as a respected leader and scholar.
Unfortunately, his situation and that of the Catholic community and academic freedom has come under siege since Yanokovich became president. I have a series of emails from the US Ukrainian community, in addition to this email directly from Gudziak, They are alarmed about developments. I've been in touch with John Tefft and sent him everything. He is aware of recent events.
I will make a folder of the correspondence for you since the community here and in Ukraine sees you as their champion. This is not a good turn of events.

Dear Melanne,

It has been awhile since we have been in touch. As you now we are under special pressure at the Ukrainian Catholic University. It is a question of our welfare and future. But not only. Almost no educational institutions have taken a stand in defense of democracy and even western Ukrainian politicians are capitulating under pressure. So is business. The approach of the new authorities is quick and systematic. Top and middle positions in all spheres of government, administration, state security, police have been rapidly changed and are effectively moving in on the freedom of the press and discourse.
Our students are scared.
Some are active, but some fear for the university, that it may loose accreditation. A father and his daughter-student came to my office in a state of anxiety.
Some students are afraid to blog and post comments because they fear that they will be traced and that their parents will loose their jobs.
There is clear evidence from one of our banks that the authorities are beginning to dig into the question of our finances. Provocations, moral defamation, planting of drugs and weapons in student residences as happened in 2004 before the election could be next.
The most effective defense is speaking out.

I am grateful for your solicitude and wanted to ask for two things.

1 To ask the Secretary of State to bring this to the attention of the president and vice president and to do what she can in our defense.

2. to help us get the story to some of the main media outlets: New York Times, Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, CNN, etc. One story by any of these for us and for the people in Ukraine that have the courage to speak the truth is invaluable.

We have had some great support already. But I have a sense that this adventure is only beginning and we have to be ready for everything.

Please pass on my respect to Secretary Clinton.

May God bless you!
Fr. Borys

Subject: H: Several observations on the Israeli raid. Sid

First observation: Bibi's Entebbe in reverse. The father, Benzion Netanyahu, 100 years old, secretary to Jabotinsky, and denounced as too radical by Begin, adored his son Yoni, heroically killed at Entebbe. Benyamin has never measured up. Benzion has constantly criticized him in public for his deviations from the doctrine of Greater Israel. Bibi desperately seeks his father's approbation and can never equal his dead brother. See Benzion's most recent scathing undermining of his son Bibi and Bibi's tearful tribute to his brother just last month. The raid on the ship to Gaza resembles the raid on Entebbe, except that there are no hostages, no guns, it's not in Africa, and it's a fiasco; otherwise, it's Entebbe. (Then, there's Ehud Barak reliving his youth as a raider killing Palestinians in Lebanon, a feat memorialized in Spielberg's film, Munich. Ultimately, it didn't work out well that time either. The film captures the moral quandaries, which appear to have escaped the participants.)
Further observation: The international press will inquire whether the Obama administration gave a wink or nod as the Bush administration did for the Lebanon and Gaza incursions. Be prepared.
Further: Of course, the consequences for US foreign policy and national security are negative across the board: from the analogy of the North Korean ship sinking and the Chinese posture to support for Iranian sanctions, etc., etc. Did the Israelis not hear Petraeus's testimony?
Further: Of course, whatever the outcome of such a raid, one of the inevitable ones would be the death of the peace process, such as it is, on the very eve of Bibi's scheduled visit to Obama, which would have been, under any circumstance, in light of the raid, profoundly humiliating for the president. Or are the Israelis bone stupid? I don't think so.
Cheers,
Sid

Like Father, Like Son? Netanyahu's Father Says Son Not Serious About Two-State Solution.

July 8, 2009 · 1 Comment

In a controversial interview with Israel's Channel II News, the father of Prime Minister Netanyahu, Professor Benzion Netanyahu, says that his son does not support a Palestinian state. The elder Netanyahu, claims that the prime Minister told him he deliberately placed impossible conditions before the Palestinians.
Here are excerpts from the interview. When asked if his son really changed his position concerning a Palestinian state, the 100 year-old historian unequivocally answered: (translation mine)

> "He does not support. He supports such conditions that they (the Arabs) will never accept it. That is what I heard from him. I didn't propose these conditions, he did. They will never accept these conditions. Not one of them."

When asked about his own personal opinion about a Palestinian state, the senior Netanyahu stated:

> Herzl and Nordau (fathers of zionist movement) did not labor to create a Palestinian state. This land is Jewish land and not a land for the Arabs. There is no place here for Arabs, and there wont be a place here for the Arabs. They will never agree to the conditions.

Netanyahu Visits Grave of Brother Who Fell in Entebbe Rescue

by Tzvi Ben Gedalyahu
Follow Israel news on and

On Saturday night, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu visited the grave of his brother Yoni, who fell during the daring rescue of hijacked Israelis in Entebbe, Uganda in 1976.

He and his wife Sarah decided to go to the gravesite on Mount Herzl 24 hours before the beginning of Remembrance Day for Fallen Soldiers in order to prevent security tie-ups for thousands of other Israelis who will visit the cemetery Sunday night and Monday.
The Netanyahus were moved emotionally after seeing for the first time a commemorative decoration that the IDF carved into the gravestone of Yoni, who led the rescue operation and was the only soldier to die in the maneuver. One of his less known heroic deeds is his saving a soldier from across Syrian lines in the Yom Kippur War in 1973.
Sirens will sound throughout Israel for one minute at 8 p.m. (1 p.m. EDT) Sunday night to mark the beginning of Memorial Day for 22,682 Fallen Soldiers and 2,431 victims of Arab terrorist attacks following the re-establishment of the State of Israel after 2,000 years. Another 1,500 civilians were killed between 1860 and the 1948 War for Independence, when seven Arab nations attacked the fledging, newly declared state just three years after the Holocaust ended.
On Monday morning, a two-minute siren will sound at 11 a.m. (4 a.m. EDT). (IsraelNationalNews.com)

Netanyahu pleased: I didn't capitulate

In the course of intimate conversations over the past few weeks with top political officials and civil servants, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has said, according to his interlocutors, that he managed to defeat the US administration.

Netanyahu is pleased by the fact that the Americans failed, so he said, to twist his arm and that ultimately, in the duel between him and the Obama administration, he was the one who emerged with the upper hand. We did not make concessions on our red lines and they failed to make us fold and to drag us to places we didn't want to go, said Netanyahu, according to people who heard him speak.

Netanyahu is convinced that he is not going to be forced to extend the settlement construction freeze, which is due to expire in September. According to senior officials in Jerusalem, an agreement has already been reached with the administration that the Israeli government will not announce an extension of the construction freeze in the territories, and the Americans will "make sure" that the Palestinians do not withdraw from the talks. Israel, however, will not take "aggressive" action and construction will be resumed only in areas that are clearly within the consensus inside the settlement blocs.

The Prime Minister's Bureau vigorously denied the above report. "The statements attributed to the prime minister are incorrect," said a spokesman in the Prime Minister's Bureau. "They were not said by Netanyahu in any forum. The reason is simple: the prime minister does not think that, Prime Minister Netanyahu holds in great esteem the commitment by President Obama and the administration to Israel's security and their efforts to renew the peace process in our region."

Eli Bardenstein adds: The formal invitation that Netanyahu received yesterday to meet with President Obama next week might attest to a radical change in the White House's attitude towards him. Political sources in Israel described the planned meeting as "the peak of the campaign for Israel and the Jews that has been pursued by the Obama administration in the past number of weeks." The sources said that the meeting was geared to put an end to the grave crisis that erupted some two months ago between the Obama administration and Netanyahu over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and particularly over the continued construction in East Jerusalem, and to mend the mistaken impression that was received as if Israel was "no longer an absolute ally of the United States."

That crisis, which was initiated by the Americans, elicited fierce criticism in the United States, and sparked a desire among members of the Obama administration to rectify the situation. Another reason for the administration's desire to end the crisis is the fear of failure in the upcoming Congressional elections in November. "The Democratic Party's coffers are empty. Many Democrat members of Congress and Senators have complained that if the hazing of Israel were to continue, they would be unable to obtain donations from Jews and were liable to lose the elections," said one source in Washington.

The prevalent assessment is that Netanyahu will be received far more warmly in Washington next week than he was two months ago. This time the meeting will be covered by the media and the two leaders are expected to have their picture taken together and to give statements to the media.

That said, sources in Washington noted that "Netanyahu is leery of the meeting with Obama and of walking into a trap once again. He knows that the smiles notwithstanding, behind closed doors he is going to have to give answers to very difficult questions, like 'how do you envision the end of the negotiations with the Palestinians.'"

Netanyahu is to begin his political travels today in Paris, where he is to attend the ceremony in honor of Israel's acceptance into the OECD. The prime minister will be arriving in a city that is on strike, which is liable to impede his movement through the city streets to the center of Paris for his meetings.

USUN PRESS RELEASE #109 May 31, 2010
AS DELIVERED

Remarks by Ambassador Alejandro Wolff, Deputy Permanent U.S. Representative to the United Nations, at an Emergency Session of the Security Council, May 31, 2010

Thank you, Mr. President and thank you, Assistant Secretary-General Fernandez-Taranco.

The United States is deeply disturbed by the recent violence and regrets the tragic loss of life and injuries suffered among those involved in the incident last night aboard the Gaza-bound ships. We are working to ascertain the facts. We expect a credible and transparent investigation and strongly urge the Israeli government to investigate the incident fully.

As I stated in the Chamber in December 2008, when we were confronted by a similar situation, mechanisms exist for the transfer of humanitarian assistance to Gaza by member states and groups that want to do so. These non-provocative and non-confrontational mechanisms should be the ones used for the benefit of all those in Gaza. Direct delivery by sea is neither appropriate nor responsible, and certainly not effective, under the circumstances.

The United States remains deeply concerned by the suffering of civilians in Gaza, and the deterioration of the situation there, including the humanitarian and human rights situation. We continue to believe the situation is unsustainable and is not in the interests of any of those concerned. We will continue to engage the Israelis on a daily basis to expand the scope and type of goods allowed into Gaza to address the full range of the population's humanitarian and recovery needs. Hamas' interference with international assistance shipments and the work of nongovernmental organizations complicates efforts in Gaza. Its continued arms smuggling and commitment to terrorism undermines security and prosperity for Palestinians and Israelis alike.

We will continue to work closely with the Government of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, along with international NGOs and the UN, to provide adequate access for humanitarian goods, including reconstruction materials, through the border crossings, while bearing in mind the Government of Israel's legitimate security concerns.

Ultimately, this incident underscores the need to move ahead quickly with negotiations that can lead to a comprehensive peace in the region. The only viable solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is an agreement, negotiated between the parties, that ends the occupation that began in 1967 and fulfills the aspirations of both parties for independent homelands through two states for two peoples, Israel and an independent, contiguous, and viable state of Palestine, living side by side in peace and security. We call again on our international partners – both inside and outside this Council – to promote an atmosphere of cooperation between the parties and throughout the entire region.

Thank you, Mr. President.

USUN PRESS RELEASE #109 May 31, 2010
AS DELIVERED

Remarks by Ambassador Alejandro Wolff, Deputy Permanent U.S. Representative to the United Nations, at an Emergency Session of the Security Council, May 31, 2010

Thank you, Mr. President and thank you, Assistant Secretary-General Fernandez-Taranco.

The United States is deeply disturbed by the recent violence and regrets the tragic loss of life and injuries suffered among those involved in the incident last night aboard the Gaza-bound ships. We are working to ascertain the facts. We expect a credible and transparent investigation and strongly urge the Israeli government to investigate the incident fully.

As I stated in the Chamber in December 2008, when we were confronted by a similar situation, mechanisms exist for the transfer of humanitarian assistance to Gaza by member states and groups that want to do so. These non-provocative and non-confrontational mechanisms should be the ones used for the benefit of all those in Gaza. Direct delivery by sea is neither appropriate nor responsible, and certainly not effective, under the circumstances.

The United States remains deeply concerned by the suffering of civilians in Gaza, and the deterioration of the situation there, including the humanitarian and human rights situation. We continue to believe the situation is unsustainable and is not in the interests of any of those concerned. We will continue to engage the Israelis on a daily basis to expand the scope and type of goods allowed into Gaza to address the full range of the population's humanitarian and recovery needs. Hamas' interference with international assistance shipments and the work of nongovernmental organizations complicates efforts in Gaza. Its continued arms smuggling and commitment to terrorism undermines security and prosperity for Palestinians and Israelis alike.

We will continue to work closely with the Government of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, along with international NGOs and the UN, to provide adequate access for humanitarian goods, including reconstruction materials, through the border crossings, while bearing in mind the Government of Israel's legitimate security concerns.

Ultimately, this incident underscores the need to move ahead quickly with negotiations that can lead to a comprehensive peace in the region. The only viable solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is an agreement, negotiated between the parties, that ends the occupation that began in 1967 and fulfills the aspirations of both parties for independent homelands through two states for two peoples, Israel and an independent, contiguous, and viable state of Palestine, living side by side in peace and security. We call again on our international partners – both inside and outside this Council – to promote an atmosphere of cooperation between the parties and throughout the entire region.

Thank you, Mr. President.

CAIRO (AP) - Qatar's prime minister says the Arab nations have endorsed direct Palestinian talks with the Israelis but left the timing to the Palestinians themselves. Sheik Hamad bin Jassem Al Thani, who chaired the meeting of Arab foreign ministers in Cairo said July 29 the timing of the direct talks "is a matter for the Palestinian side to decide." The U.S. and the Europeans have been pushing Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to restart the direct talks, which broke off in 2008, immediately. Abbas, however, has said he would only restart talks if Israel agrees to a halt in settlement construction and accepts a Palestinian state in territories seized in the 1967 Middle East war, the West Bank, Gaza, and east Jerusalem. He first wants progress in the current U.S. mediated indirect talks.

JERUSALEM (Reuters) – Israel has rejected a Palestinian proposal to begin face-to-face peace talks on the basis of a statement by major powers that would set their terms of reference. Reports in the left-wing dailies Haaretz and Maariv said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told U.S. envoy George Mitchell that he wants direct talks to start immediately but will not accept any preconditions. Netanyahu spokesman Mark Regev had no direct comment on the reports, which said Mitchell's mission had "failed." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas refuses to engage in direct talks before Netanyahu agrees to a clear agenda.

The Unnecessary Fall

A counter-history of the Obama presidency.

- John B. Judis
- August 12, 2010 | 12:00 am

On April 14, 2009, as Barack Obama's standing in the polls was beginning to slip, and as Tea Party demonstrators were amassing in Washington for tax day protests, the president gave a lengthy address atGeorgetown University explaining the "five pillars" of his economic policies. The speech was intended to promote a memorable slogan for Obama's program that would evoke comparisons with Theodore Roosevelt's Square Deal, Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, and Lyndon Johnson's Great Society.

Obama's contribution was to be the New Foundation. "We must lay a new foundation for growth and prosperity–a foundation that will move us from an era of borrow and spend to one where we save and invest," he declared. Obama would repeat the phrase seven times that day and on many more occasions over the next months. At Obama's private White House dinner with presidential historians that June, the historians were no more impressed than the public with the New Foundation as a slogan. "I don't think it's going to work," Robert Dallek warned. Doris Kearns Goodwin said it sounded "like a woman's girdle."

One of these historians might have been able to forewarn Obama that the slogan had been unsuccessfully deployed by a Democratic president once before. In his 1979 State of the Union address, Jimmy Carter began, "Tonight, I want to examine in a broad sense the state of our American Union–how we are building a new foundation for a peaceful and a prosperous world." Carter would use the phrase five times in the speech, including in its conclusion, where he asked members of Congress to join him "in building that new foundation." Like Obama's effort, the phrase inspired, at most, a few underwear jokes and was then forgotten.

Obama's evocation of Carter was obviously unintended–but the Man from Plains is indeed the specter now hanging over his presidency. Of course, Obama has already accomplished more in his first 20 months than Jimmy Carter did during his entire presidency. But there is a disturbing political resemblance between the two presidencies. Both men ran inspired campaigns in which they positioned themselves above the scandals and partisan quarrels of their predecessors and initially stirred hopes of a "transformational" presidency. But, as presidents, both men somehow failed to connect with large parts of the electorate.

To be sure, there are a number of very specific reasons why Carter and Obama landed in political trouble. Both men contended with rising unemployment–Carter with rampant inflation as well–and voters' approval of a president and his party tend to track closely with changes in the economy. Carter faced friction in his own party and the rise of a powerful business lobby, and Obama has dealt with a Republican Party that has frustrated his dreams of a post-partisan presidency. Yet the most important reason for their difficulties–evident in their inept attempts to brand their programs–has been an inability to develop a politics that resonates with the public.

In the United States, politics pivots around the allegiance of the middle class, even as its identity has changed from yeoman farmers and mechanics to store clerks, office workers, x-ray technicians, and small business owners. They are, in Bill Clinton's words, "those who work hard and play by the rules." They are the central characters in a populist rhetoric that goes back to the early republic. It depicts the middle class as embattled and threatened either from forces below (impoverished immigrants, welfare cheaters, ghetto rioters) or above (Wall Street speculators, state bureaucrats, K Street lobbyists). Populism can be embraced by Glenn Beck or Tom Harkin. It is intrinsically neither left-wing nor right-wing.

Politicians, such as Franklin Roosevelt or Ronald Reagan, who found a way of using populism's appeal during downturns have enjoyed success, while those who have spurned it have suffered accordingly. If, in circumstances like the present one, you don't develop a populist politics, your adversaries will use populism to define you as an enemy of the people. That's what Carter discovered during the stagflation of the late '70s. And that's what has happened in the last 20 months of the Great Recession to Barack Obama and to the Democratic Party he leads.

Obama took office with widespread popular support, even among Republicans, and some of his first efforts, including the $800 billion stimulus, initially enjoyed strong public favor. But that wide appeal began to dissipate by the late spring of 2009. Disillusion with Obama fueled the November defeat of Democratic gubernatorial candidates in New Jersey and Virginia. By January 2010, it was a crucial factor in Republican Scott Brown's astonishing victory over Martha Coakley in Massachusetts.

In the postmortem debate over these defeats, some Democrats have blamed Obama's dogged pursuit of health care reform while the economy was hemorrhaging jobs. That may have been a factor, but the real damage was done earlier. What doomed Obama politically was the way he dealt with the financial crisis in the first six months of his presidency. In an atmosphere primed for a populist backlash, he allowed the right wing to define the terms.

As Obama was delivering his inaugural address, the financial crisis was already in full swing; and it was already apparent that financial speculation, outright fraud, and irresponsible and sometimes illegal housing-loan practices had played a very large role in precipitating the crisis. The public was up in arms. But, instead of rallying the public against the "money changers," as Roosevelt had done in his first inaugural, Obama, taking a leaf from Jimmy Carter's infamous "malaise" speech, put the blame on the public as a whole. "Our economy is badly weakened, a consequence of greed and irresponsibility on the part of some, but also our collective failure to make hard choices and prepare the nation for a new age," he declared.

Over the next month, Obama would periodically criticize bankers after embarrassing revelations–at various times calling the bonuses they gave themselves "shameful" and an "outrage"–but, after hearing complaints about his rhetoric from the bankers, he would back off. At a private meeting on March 28 with 13 Wall Street CEOs, the president, his spokesman Robert Gibbs said, "emphasized that Wall Street needs Main Street and Main Street needs Wall Street." And, in his Georgetown speech, Obama returned to his theme of collective responsibility. The recession, Obama said, "was caused by a perfect storm of irresponsibility and poor decision-making that stretched from Wall Street to Washington to Main Street."

Obama's policy followed the same swerving course as his rhetoric. One week, he would favor harsh restrictions on bank and insurance-company bonuses, but, the next week, he would waver; one week, he would support legislation allowing bankruptcy judges to reduce the amount that homeowners threatened with foreclosure owed the banks; the next week, he would fail to protest when bank lobbyists pressured the Senate to kill these provisions. But, more importantly, Obama–in sharp contrast to Roosevelt in his first months–failed to push Congress to immediately enact new financial regulations or even to set up a commission to investigate fraud. (When Congress finally appointed a commission in July 2009, Obama and his party put a milquetoast Democratic politician, former California State Treasurer Philip Angelides, in charge of it.)

Obama's appointments also conveyed an impression that he wanted to let Wall Street off the hook. He appointed Timothy Geithner to be treasury secretary. Geithner claimed that he was not part of Wall Street, but, in his capacity as president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, he had served under a board of directors headed by JP Morgan Chase CEO Jamie Dimon. As New York Fed president, Geithner had been partly responsible for the decision to let Lehman Brothers go under, for the unpopular tarp program, and for American International Group (AIG) paying back its Wall Street creditors with government money. Geithner chose as his chief of staff a former lobbyist for Goldman Sachs. Retiring Democratic Senator Byron Dorgan told me, "Most Americans were reading about the massive compensations and bailouts, and the administration largely hired people from the culture of Wall Street."

By the spring, Obama's apparent tilt to Wall Street had sparked a right-wing populist revolt in the country. The newly formed Tea Party movement, Beck and Fox News, and a host of right-wing bloggers were leading the charge; but, in a less extreme form, the general public shared their anger. In an early April New York Times/CBS News poll, the public disapproved of Obama's aiding the banks by 58 percent to 33 percent. In this same poll, public approval of Obama's handling of the economy began to fall. Pollsters who did focus groups also traced disillusionment with Obama's economic policies to his handling of the financial crisis.

Congressman Barney Frank, who defends Obama's policies, acknowledges that the president's political difficulties began with the revelation that AIG, which had received $170 billion from the government, had paid out $165 billion in bonuses to the division that had brought the company down. Geithner had known about the bonuses but insisted there were no legal grounds to block them. (It then came out that Geithner had pressured Senate Banking Committee Chairman Chris Dodd to insert a provision in the stimulus bill that protected the bonuses.) "The pitchforks were out. It added injury to injury," Frank says. That's when public opinion of Geithner plummeted. According to a Rasmussen poll, 24 percent had a favorable view of Geithner and 44 percent an unfavorable one.

The public's view of the bank bailout and the AIG bonuses colored its view of the auto bailout, the stimulus, and health care reform. One of the rallying cries for the populist opposition to Obama was "where's my bailout?" (Obama himself acknowledged that it was "one of the most frequent questions" he was asked in letters.) The auto program became a bailout for the Big Three CEOs; the stimulus became a bailout of government itself; and health care reform was a bailout for the uninsured–or "reparations," as Rush Limbaugh put it. Wrote right-wing blogger Michelle Malkin, "hardworking citizens were getting sick of being played for chumps" by "moochers, big and small, corporate and individual, trampling over themselves with their hands out demanding endless bailouts." Obama and the Democrats were successfully portrayed as aiding "the moochers," but not the "hardworking citizens." In American politics, that's a recipe for political disaster.

Some in the White House political operation recognized in the late spring that the administration's economic efforts were being defined by right-wing populism and tried to push Obama to take a more populist tack. A group within the White House began calling themselves the "pitchfork gang," but they would find their attempts to convince Obama to get tough on Wall Street or on insurance companies undermined by Geithner and by National Economic Council head Larry Summers, who were worried about upsetting business confidence. "There was a continual tension in the White House," says a person who was privy to the discussions. "One week, we would be very hot, and then, the next week, we would dial it back."

By early January of this year, Obama was clearly losing the battle for the middle class. According to a CNN poll, 60 percent of Americans thought Obama "had paid more attention to the problems faced by banks and other financial institutions" than to the "problems faced by middle class Americans." Only 28 percent, barely more than a quarter, thought he had paid more attention to the middle class. As Brown surged ahead of Coakley in the polls, the White House temporarily embraced a populist approach. On January 14, Obama called the bank bonuses "obscene" and said, "we want our money back." In a January 22 speech at Lorain County Community College in Elyria, Ohio (a far cry from Georgetown), Obama used the word "fighting" 13 times and "fight" nine times. "I will not stop fighting for you," he declared.

But, faced with a falling stock market and anger from Wall Street, Obama once again turned conciliatory. On February 10, he said that he didn't "begrudge" the $17 million bonus awarded to Dimon and the $9 million to Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein. "I know both guys. They are very savvy businessmen."

Obama's reluctance to rail against Wall Street might have led to a watered-down financial reform bill, or even no bill at all, but, on April 16, the Securities and Exchange Commission indicted Goldman Sachs for fraud. The next week, an emboldened Obama went to New York to criticize the bankers directly for their "failure of responsibility." As a result of the indictment and Obama's rediscovery of his anger, Republicans became somewhat less obstructionist, moderate Republicans broke with the party's leadership, and moderate Democrats fell into line. Congress produced a much stronger bill than the Democrats had ever expected.

But Obama's embrace of populism has remained fitful and sporadic. After the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and Verizon's Ivan Seidenberg, the head of the Business Roundtable, criticized Obama for being anti-business in June, the president dispatched Geithner, White House aide Valerie Jarrett, and Bill Clinton to appease the business community. Obama has said enough to anger the CEOs, but he has failed to convey to the greater public that he is fighting for them.

Obama's unwillingness to buck Wall Street and the Business Roundtable, along with his delayed and muddled response to the BP disaster in the Gulf, has eroded the public's confidence in his leadership. In Pew's midyear report card on Obama's image, the greatest drop from February 2009 to this June was in the perception of Obama as a "strong leader." Voters will sometimes tolerate policies they question from presidents like John Kennedy or Reagan, whom they regard as "strong," but not from politicians like Jimmy Carter, whom they regard as weak.

What of the other factors behind Obama's political difficulties? There is no doubt that, if the economy were growing faster, and if unemployment were dropping below 9 percent, Obama and the Democrats would be more popular and not fearing a November rout. But, unfortunately, the economy's sluggish recovery cannot be completely disentangled from the White House's weak political performance.

In January, when the White House debated how large a stimulus to propose, Christina Romer, the head of the Council of Economic Advisors, proposed a $1.2 trillion Keynesian jolt. David Obey, the chairman of the House Budget Committee, told The Fiscal Times that Obama's Treasury Department asked initially for a $1.4 trillion bill. But the administration finally proposed a stimulus between $700 and $800 billion that included large tax cuts that were more likely to stimulate saving than consumption–and spending that would be unlikely to produce many jobs until the end of Obama's first term. In the stimulus's first year, the administration spent only $17 billion of the $139 billion allocated for infrastructure spending.

Prominent economists, including Paul Krugman and Joseph Stiglitz, made the case that a much larger stimulus was necessary to reverse (rather than merely reduce) the rise in unemployment, and that, if a modest stimulus failed to reduce unemployment, Republicans would convince the public that the stimulus was toxic medication and would block additional Keynesian measures. That argument has been proven sadly correct. Some White House advisers appear to have underestimated the depth of the Great Recession. Others seem to have doubted the administration had the political clout to get more from Congress.

But the White House might have gotten more if Obama had proclaimed a national economic emergency (which it was); framed the issue in terms of rescuing the middle class from damage done by Wall Street speculators, short-sighted CEOs, and Chinese mercantilism; and directly attacked Republicans as heartless obstructionists. When Obama belatedly made this sort of case on the eve of the financial reform vote this year, he got a much stronger bill than anyone had anticipated. So it's not clear that the failure to get a larger stimulus–which has ended up hurting the administration politically–wasn't itself a result of political timidity.

The president has also suffered from an inability to explain to the public why he sought such a large stimulus and what he thought it could accomplish. Obama's New Foundation speech at Georgetown was soon forgotten. Afterward, Obama, to the dismay of Democrats in Congress and some of his White House aides, pretty much dropped the jobs issue. From then to Labor Day, he devoted a July visit to Buffalo and an August stopover in southern Indiana to the issue–at a time when the right wing was mobilizing against him. Obama didn't just fail to develop a consistent narrative about the economy; he didn't really try.

Contrast Obama's attempt to develop a politics to justify his economic program with what Reagan did in 1982. Faced with steadily rising unemployment, which went from 8.6 percent in January to 10.4 percent in November, Reagan and his political staff, which included James Baker, Mike Deaver, and Ed Rollins, forged a strategy early that year calling for voters to "stay the course" and blaming the current economic troubles on Democratic profligacy. "We are clearing away the economic wreckage that was dumped in our laps," Reagan declared. Democrats accused them of playing "the blame game," but the strategy, followed to the letter by the White House for ten months, worked. The Republicans were predicted to lose as many as 50 House seats, but they lost only 26 and broke even in the Senate.

Some commentators have noted Reagan's popularity was even lower than Obama's. But, on key economic questions, he did much better than Obama and the Democrats are currently performing–and voters expressed far greater patience with Reagan's program. According to polls, even as the unemployment rate climbed, a narrow plurality still expressed confidence that Reagan's program would help the economy. On the eve of the election, with the unemployment rate at a postwar high, a New York Times/CBS News poll found that 60 percent of likely voters thought Reagan's economic program would eventually help the country. That's a sign of a successful political operation. If Obama could command those numbers, Democrats could seriously limit their losses in November. But Obama has not been able to develop a narrative that could convince people to trust him and the Democrats.

Why has the White House failed to convince the public that it is fighting effectively on its behalf? The principal culprit is clearly Barack Obama. He has a strange aversion to confrontational politics. His aversion is strange because he was schooled in it, working as a community organizer in the 1980s, under the tutelage of activists who subscribed to teachings of the radical Saul Alinsky. But, when Obama departed for Harvard Law School in 1988, he left Alinsky and adversarial tactics behind.

The young lawyer who returned to Chicago and won a seat in the Illinois state Senate in 1996 practiced a very different style of politics. Obama's principal accomplishments in Springfield were bills restricting lobbying and requiring videotaping of confessions in potential death penalty cases. He was not a typical blue-collar, bread-and-butter Chicago Democrat, but the kind of good government liberal that represents the upscale districts of the city, seeing in politics a higher calling and ill at ease with (although not in open opposition to) the city's Democratic machine. He was also a post-racial politician who eschewed the hard-edged, angry rhetoric of Jesse Jackson. (That, too, is oddly reminiscent of Carter, who partly campaigned in 1976 as the white Southern antidote to George Wallace's angry racial populism.)

Obama carried this outlook into the U.S. Senate, into his campaign for the presidency, and then, into the presidency itself. He is a cerebral, dispassionate, post-partisan; he wants to "end the political strategy that has been based on division," to "turn the page" on the culture wars of the 1960s and the partisan battles of the 1990s. During the campaign, his aides jokingly referred to him as the "black Jesus." While he can tolerate and even brush aside conflict, he is reluctant to actively foment it. "In a time of crisis, we can't afford to govern out of anger," he declared in February 2009. During his campaign and his first year in office, he held to a blind faith in bipartisanship, even as the Republicans voted as a bloc against his legislation. He is, perhaps, ill-suited in these respects for an era of bruising political warfare.

His advisers have clearly reinforced these inclinations. In the campaign, they fashioned him as the outsider candidate of "hope" and "change" and have extended this strategy into the presidency itself. They see him as standing above party. In a meeting with congressional leaders last April, senior adviser David Axelrod rejected the complaint that Obama accorded equal blame to Democrats and Republicans with his descriptions of the "cynical politics in Washington." Within the White House, top aides still speak of promoting the Obama "brand." Organizing for America, the administration's campaign organization, which is supposed to be focusing on the 2010 elections, recently devoted its resources to organizing parties across the country to celebrate Obama's forty-ninth birthday.

These efforts to elevate Obama above the hurly-burly of Washington politics have been disastrous. Obama's image as an iconic outsider has become the screen on which Fox News, the Tea Party, radicalright bloggers, and assorted politicians have projected the image of him as a foreigner, an Islamic radical, and a socialist. He has remained "the other" that he aspired to be during the campaign, but he and his advisers no longer control how that otherness is defined.

The White House and cabinet officials he appointed have reinforced his aversion to populism. As Jonathan Alter recounts in The Promise: President Obama, Year One, Geithner and Summers repeatedly blocked attempts to get tough on Wall Street on the grounds that doing so would threaten the recovery itself by upsetting the bankers. For most of his first year, Alter writes, "Obama bought the Geithner-Summers argument that the banks were fragile and couldn't be confronted while they remained in peril." Its reluctance to come down on the bankers crippled the administration politically, making it far more difficult for it to get its way with Congress on a second stimulus program that would have boosted the recovery and Democrats' political prospects. Bad politics can trump good policy.

Populism has profound shortcomings as a worldview. It tends toward demagoguery. In its relentless focus on the middle class, it can ignore or stigmatize those below it. It can prove hostile to a long-range scientific outlook. A more populist Obama, for instance, might have postponed the battle for climate change legislation or national health insurance and probably would have taken a weaker stand on immigration. But populism has been an indelible part of the American political psyche, and those who are uncomfortable making populist appeals, like Hoover or Carter–or, more recently, presidential candidate John Kerry–suffer the consequences at the polls.

If Obama's politics leads to a Republican takeover of one or both houses of Congress, and even to a Republican president in 2012, then much of what Obama has accomplished could be undone. It's unlikely that a new Republican president and Congress would actually repeal the health care or the financial reform bill. But the former could be starved of public funds and deprived of regulatory oversight; and the latter could be neutered by a hostile treasury secretary and by weak or hostile presidential appointees to the Securities and Exchange Commission or the new Consumer Financial Protection Agency. Reform legislation needs administrations and congresses committed to reform. That is where politics has to come in; and that's where the Obama administration, with its aversion to populism, has fallen short.

Or I could send the endless pieces on Obama and his troubles or Haaretz on the new negotiations. I'll skip the torrent of Obama pieces (see Politico lead piece today, if you want to catch the full updraft of new conventional wisdom), but include Haaretz below from its editorial editor and Teddy Kollek's former spokesman:

With a victory like this...

The direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have preconditions - dictated by Israel.

By Akiva Eldar Tags: Israel news Middle East peace
Two years ago, a basketball tournament was held at Tel Aviv University with the participation of student teams from 14 countries, including a Palestinian team from the occupied territories. The games were purportedly held "without preconditions," and every team put its best players on the court and aimed to win.
But unsurprisingly, the Shin Ben security service permitted only seven Palestinian players, including bench players, to enter Israel. Some of the key players on the team were compelled to stay at home. After several losses (by 30 to 40 points), when it was the Palestinians' turn to face a team from one of the Israeli colleges, their coach announced that he had decided to spare his players another humiliation, and requested that the game be canceled.
The illuminating movie "Friendship Games," to be shown tonight on the Yes Docu channel (directed by Ram Levy, along with Ibtisam Mara'ana, Duki Dror and Yoav Shamir), documents the tournament, which was the initiative of Ed Peskowitz, an American Jew and co-owner of the Atlanta Hawks basketball team in the NBA. The camera follows the Israeli coach to the Palestinian locker room. After a long while, he tells his players that in order to even out the teams, two of them will join the other side. He tells two of the Israeli bench players, including one known as Fatso, to don the shirts of the Palestinian team. The game ends with a decisive victory for the Israeli team and a strong sense of missed opportunity.
The direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, like the basketball game, have preconditions. Not the conditions demanded by the Palestinians, but conditions dictated by Israel. The refusal to freeze Israeli building in East Jerusalem is a precondition, just like the demand to freeze it. The refusal to resume negotiations from the point where talks between the previous prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas left off after the Annapolis conference is no less a precondition than the demand to resume talks from square one.
The head referee, the president of the United States, has twisted the arms of his colleagues in the Quartet and is dragging Abbas to Washington. Barack Obama decided that the negotiations will be held without any commitment regarding building in East Jerusalem, and will be opened without even a declaration of principles stating that the talks will be held on the basis of a general formula, like peace and security for Israel and a state along the 1967 borders for the Palestinians.
It's time to jump into the fountain in Rabin Square and cheer: The Palestinians have been shafted!
If Benjamin Netanyahu's aim is to play around as much as possible with the ball, and sometimes kick the opponent, then he can really chalk up another victory. But Israel's success in the negotiations, like the success of the student team in the tournament, is not measured by the terms "victory" or "defeat." What is victory over a weak Palestinian team worth, if it was won in friendly games that ended with virtually no interaction between the participants? What is a political process with the Palestinians worth if it erodes Abbas' standing and leads nowhere?

What have we to gain from humiliating our partner before his constituency on the way to the negotiating table? If Israel's approach on every one of the core issues is that winning is everything, there's no point in bothering so many VIPs with another unnecessary summit. Let's assume that we'll succeed, with the help of the Jewish power around Obama, to twist Abbas' arm some more and extract, for example, an agreement in which he concedes sovereignty over the Temple Mount. How many hours would such an agreement last?
All we need is a few more "victories" like the invitation to the launch of direct negotiations, "without preconditions," and we'll lose our last partners to a settlement that will prevent Israel from turning into an apartheid state or a Palestinian state (the binational model is a nightmare, as far as I'm concerned).
What will we do if Abbas announces that he's had enough of losing in purportedly friendly games, and that he's decided the time has come to step down? Will we declare another victory and invite Hamas leader Khaled Meshal and Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to the party?

COVERT OPERATIONS

The billionaire brothers who are waging a war against Obama.

by Jane Mayer
<http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/bios/jane_mayer/search?contributorName=jane%20mayer>

AUGUST 30, 2010

David H. Koch in 1996. He and his brother Charles are lifelong libertarians and have quietly given more than a hundred million dollars to right-wing causes.

On May 17th, a black-tie audience at the Metropolitan Opera House applauded as a tall, jovial-looking billionaire took the stage. It was the seventieth annual spring gala of American Ballet Theatre, and David H. Koch was being celebrated for his generosity as a member of the board of trustees; he had recently donated $2.5 million toward the company's upcoming season, and had given many millions before that. Koch received an award while flanked by two of the gala's co-chairs, Blaine Trump, in a peach-colored gown, and Caroline Kennedy Schlossberg, in emerald green. Kennedy's mother, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, had been a patron of the ballet and, coincidentally, the previous owner of a Fifth Avenue apartment that Koch had bought, in 1995, and then sold, eleven years later, for thirty-two million dollars, having found it too small.

The gala marked the social ascent of Koch, who, at the age of seventy, has become one of the city's most prominent philanthropists. In 2008, he donated a hundred million dollars to modernize Lincoln Center's New York State Theatre building, which now bears his name. He has given twenty million to the American Museum of Natural History, whose dinosaur wing is named for him. This spring, after noticing the decrepit state of the fountains outside the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Koch pledged at least ten million dollars for their renovation. He is a trustee of the museum, perhaps the most coveted social prize in the city, and serves on the board of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, where, after he donated more than forty million dollars, an endowed chair and a research center were named for him.

One dignitary was conspicuously absent from the gala: the event's third honorary co-chair, Michelle Obama. Her office said that a scheduling conflict had prevented her from attending. Yet had the First Lady shared the stage with Koch it might have created an awkward tableau. In Washington, Koch is best known as part of a family that has repeatedly funded stealth attacks on the federal government, and on the Obama Administration in particular.

revenues are estimated to be a hundred billion dollars. The company has grown spectacularly since their father, Fred, died, in 1967, and the brothers took charge. The Kochs operate oil refineries in Alaska, Texas, and Minnesota, and control some four thousand miles of pipeline. Koch Industries owns Brawny paper towels, Dixie cups, Georgia-Pacific lumber, Stainmaster carpet, and Lycra, among other products. Forbes ranks it as the second-largest private company in the country, after Cargill, and its consistent profitability has made David and Charles Koch—who, years ago, bought out two other brothers—among the richest men in America. Their combined fortune of thirty-five billion dollars is exceeded only by those of Bill Gates and Warren Buffett.

The Kochs are longtime libertarians who believe in drastically lower personal and corporate taxes, minimal social services for the needy, and much less oversight of industry—especially environmental regulation. These views dovetail with the brothers' corporate interests. In a study released this spring, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst's Political Economy Research Institute named Koch Industries one of the top ten air polluters in the United States. And Greenpeace issued a report identifying the company as a "kingpin of climate science denial." The report showed that, from 2005 to 2008, the Kochs vastly outdid ExxonMobil in giving money to organizations fighting legislation related to climate change, underwriting a huge network of foundations, think tanks, and political front groups. Indeed, the brothers have funded opposition campaigns against so many Obama Administration policies—from health-care reform to the economic-stimulus program—that, in political circles, their ideological network is known as the Kochtopus.

In a statement, Koch Industries said that the Greenpeace report "distorts the environmental record of our companies." And David Koch, in a recent, admiring article about him in New York, protested that the "radical press" had turned his family into "whipping boys," and had exaggerated its influence on American politics. But Charles Lewis, the founder of the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan watchdog group, said, "The Kochs are on a whole different level. There's no one else who has spent this much money. The sheer dimension of it is what sets them apart. They have a pattern of lawbreaking, political manipulation, and obfuscation. I've been in Washington since Watergate, and I've never seen anything like it. They are the Standard Oil of our times."

few weeks after the Lincoln Center gala, the advocacy wing of the Americans for Prosperity Foundation—an organization that David Koch started, in 2004—held a different kind of gathering. Over the July 4th weekend, a summit called Texas Defending the American Dream took place in a chilly hotel ballroom in Austin. Though Koch freely promotes his philanthropic ventures, he did not attend the summit, and his name was not in evidence. And on this occasion the audience was roused not by a dance performance but by a series of speakers denouncing President Barack Obama. Peggy Venable, the organizer of the summit, warned that Administration officials "have a socialist vision for this country."

Five hundred people attended the summit, which served, in part, as a training session for Tea Party activists in Texas. An advertisement cast the event as a populist uprising against vested corporate power. "Today, the voices of average Americans are being drowned out by lobbyists and special interests," it said. "But you can do something about it." The pitch made no mention of its corporate funders. The White House has expressed frustration that such sponsors have largely eluded public notice. David Axelrod, Obama's senior adviser, said, "What they don't say is that, in part, this is a grassroots citizens' movement brought to you by a bunch of oil billionaires."

In April, 2009, Melissa Cohlmia, a company spokesperson, denied that the Kochs had direct links to the Tea Party, saying that Americans for Prosperity is "an independent organization and Koch companies do not in any way direct their activities." Later, she issued a statement: "No funding has been provided by Koch companies, the Koch foundations, or Charles Koch or David Koch specifically to support the tea parties." David Koch told New York, "I've never been to a tea-party event. No one representing the tea party has ever even approached me."

At the lectern in Austin, however, Venable—a longtime political operative who draws a salary from Americans for Prosperity, and who has worked for Koch-funded political groups since 1994—spoke less warily. "We love what the Tea Parties are doing, because that's how we're going to take back America!" she declared, as the crowd cheered. In a subsequent interview, she described herself as an early member of the movement, joking, "I was part of the Tea Party before it was cool!" She explained that the role of Americans for Prosperity was to help "educate" Tea Party activists on policy details, and to give them "next-step training" after their rallies, so that their political energy could be channelled "more effectively." And she noted that Americans for Prosperity had provided Tea Party activists with lists of elected officials to target. She said of the Kochs, "They're certainly our people. David's the chairman of our board. I've certainly met with them, and I'm very appreciative of what they do."

Venable honored several Tea Party "citizen leaders" at the summit. The Texas branch of Americans for Prosperity gave its Blogger of the Year Award to a young woman named Sibyl West. On June 14th, West, writing on her site, described Obama as the "cokehead in chief." In an online thread, West speculated that the President was exhibiting symptoms of "demonic possession (aka schizophrenia, etc.)." The summit featured several paid speakers, including Janine Turner, the actress best known for her role on the television series "Northern Exposure." She declared, "They don't want our children to know about their rights. They don't want our children to know about a God!"

During a catered lunch, Venable introduced Ted Cruz, a former solicitor general of Texas, who told the crowd that Obama was "the most radical President ever to occupy the Oval Office," and had hidden from voters a secret agenda—"the government taking over our economy and our lives." Countering Obama, Cruz proclaimed, was "the epic fight of our generation!" As the crowd rose to its feet and cheered, he quoted the defiant words of a Texan at the Alamo: "Victory, or death!"

Americans for Prosperity has worked closely with the Tea Party since the movement's inception. In the weeks before the first Tax Day protests, in April, 2009, Americans for Prosperity hosted a Web site offering supporters "Tea Party Talking Points." The Arizona branch urged people to send tea bags to Obama; the Missouri branch urged members to sign up for "Taxpayer Tea Party Registration" and provided directions to nine protests. The group continues to stoke the rebellion. The North Carolina branch recently launched a "Tea Party Finder" Web site, advertised as "a hub for all the Tea Parties in North Carolina."

The anti-government fervor infusing the 2010 elections represents a political triumph for the Kochs. By giving money to "educate," fund, and organize Tea Party protesters, they have helped turn their private agenda into a mass movement. Bruce Bartlett, a conservative economist and a historian, who once worked at the National Center for Policy Analysis, a Dallas-based think tank that the Kochs fund, said, "The problem with the whole libertarian movement is that it's been all chiefs and no Indians. There haven't been any actual people, like voters, who give a crap about it. So the problem for the Kochs has been trying to create a movement." With the emergence of the Tea Party, he said,

"everyone suddenly sees that for the first time there are Indians out there—people who can provide real ideological power." The Kochs, he said, are "trying to shape and control and channel the populist uprising into their own policies."

A Republican campaign consultant who has done research on behalf of Charles and David Koch said of the Tea Party, "The Koch brothers gave the money that founded it. It's like they put the seeds in the ground. Then the rainstorm comes, and the frogs come out of the mud—and they're our candidates!"

The Kochs and their political operatives declined requests for interviews. Instead, a prominent New York public-relations executive who is close with the Kochs put forward two friends: George Pataki, the former governor of New York, and Mortimer Zuckerman, the publisher and real-estate magnate. Pataki, a Republican who received campaign donations from David Koch, called him "a patriot who cares deeply about his country." Zuckerman praised David's "gentle decency" and the "range of his public interests."

The Republican campaign consultant said of the family's political activities, "To call them under the radar is an understatement. They are underground!"

Another former Koch adviser said, "They're smart. This right-wing, redneck stuff works for them. They see this as a way to get things done without getting dirty themselves." Rob Stein, a Democratic political strategist who has studied the conservative movement's finances, said that the Kochs are "at the epicenter of the anti-Obama movement. But it's not just about Obama. They would have done the same to Hillary Clinton. They did the same with Bill Clinton. They are out to destroy progressivism."

ddly enough, the fiercely capitalist Koch family owes part of its fortune to Joseph Stalin. Fred Koch was the son of a Dutch printer who settled in Texas and ran a weekly newspaper. Fred attended M.I.T., where he earned a degree in chemical engineering. In 1927, he invented a more efficient process for converting oil into gasoline, but, according to family lore, America's major oil companies regarded him as a threat and shut him out of the industry. Unable to succeed at home, Koch found work in the Soviet Union. In the nineteen-thirties, his company trained Bolshevik engineers and helped Stalin's regime set up fifteen modern oil refineries. Over time, however, Stalin brutally purged several of Koch's Soviet colleagues. Koch was deeply affected by the experience, and regretted his collaboration. He returned to the U.S. In the headquarters of his company, Rock Island Oil & Refining, in Wichita, he kept photographs aimed at proving that some of those Soviet refineries had been destroyed in the Second World War. Gus diZerega, a former friend of Charles Koch, recalled, "As the Soviets became a stronger military power, Fred felt a certain amount of guilt at having helped build them up. I think it bothered him a lot."

In 1958, Fred Koch became one of the original members of the John Birch Society, the arch-conservative group known, in part, for a highly skeptical view of governance and for spreading fears of a Communist takeover. Members considered President Dwight D. Eisenhower to be a Communist agent. In a self-published broadside, Koch claimed that "the Communists have infiltrated both the Democrat and Republican Parties." He wrote admiringly of Benito Mussolini's suppression of Communists in Italy, and disparagingly of the American civil-rights movement. "The colored man looms large in the Communist plan to take over America," he warned. Welfare was a secret plot to attract rural blacks to cities, where they would foment "a vicious race war." In a 1963 speech that prefigures the Tea Party's talk of a secret socialist plot, Koch predicted that Communists would "infiltrate the highest offices of government in the U.S. until the President is a Communist, unknown to the rest of us."

Koch married Mary Robinson, the daughter of a Missouri physician, and they had four sons: Freddie, Charles, and twins, David and William. John Damgard, the president of the Futures Industry Association, was David's schoolmate and friend. He recalled that Fred Koch was "a real John Wayne type." Koch emphasized rugged pursuits, taking his sons big-game hunting in Africa, and requiring them to do farm labor at the family ranch. The Kochs lived in a stone mansion on a large compound across from Wichita's country club; in the summer, the boys could hear their friends splashing in the pool, but they were not allowed to join them. "By instilling a work ethic in me at an early age, my father did me a big favor, although it didn't seem like a favor back then," Charles has written. "By the time I was eight, he made sure work occupied most of my spare time." David Koch recalled that his father also indoctrinated the boys politically. "He was constantly speaking to us children about what was wrong with government," he told Brian Doherty, an editor of the libertarian magazine Reason, and the author of "Radicals for Capitalism," a 2007 history of the libertarian movement. "It's something I grew up with—a fundamental point of view that big government was bad, and imposition of government controls on our lives and economic fortunes was not good."

David attended Deerfield Academy, in Massachusetts, and Charles was sent to military school. Charles, David, and William all earned engineering degrees at their father's alma mater, M.I.T., and later joined the family company. Charles eventually assumed control, with David as his deputy; William's career at the company was less successful. Freddie went to Harvard and studied playwriting at the Yale School of Drama. His father reportedly disapproved of him, and punished him financially. (Freddie, through a spokesperson, denied this.)

In 1967, after Fred Koch died, of a heart attack, Charles renamed the business Koch Industries, in honor of his father. Fred Koch's will made his sons extraordinarily wealthy. David Koch joked about his good fortune in a 2003 speech to alumni at Deerfield, where, after pledging twenty-five million dollars, he was made the school's sole "lifetime trustee." He said, "You might ask: How does David Koch happen to have the wealth to be so generous? Well, let me tell you a story. It all started when I was a little boy. One day, my father gave me an apple. I soon sold it for five dollars and bought two apples and sold them for ten. Then I bought four apples and sold them for twenty. Well, this went on day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, until my father died and left me three hundred million dollars!"

David and Charles had absorbed their father's conservative politics, but they did not share all his views, according to diZerega, who befriended Charles in the mid-sixties, after meeting him while browsing in a John Birch Society bookstore in Wichita. Charles eventually invited him to the Kochs' mansion, to participate in an informal political-discussion group. "It was pretty clear that Charles thought some of the Birch Society was bullshit," diZerega recalled. DiZerega, who has lost touch with Charles, eventually abandoned right-wing views, and became a political-science professor. He credits Charles with opening his mind to political philosophy, which set him on the path to academia; Charles is one of three people to whom he dedicated his first book. But diZerega believes that the Koch brothers have followed a wayward intellectual trajectory, transferring their father's paranoia about Soviet Communism to a distrust of the U.S. government, and seeing its expansion, beginning with the New Deal, as a tyrannical threat to freedom. In an essay, posted on Beliefnet, diZerega writes, "As state socialism failed . . . the target for many within these organizations shifted to any kind of regulation at all. 'Socialism' kept being defined downwards."

Members of the John Birch Society developed an interest in a school of Austrian economists who promoted free-market ideals. Charles and David Koch were particularly influenced by the work of Friedrich von Hayek, the author of "The Road to Serfdom" (1944), which argued that centralized government planning led, inexorably, to totalitarianism. Hayek's belief in unfettered capitalism has proved inspirational to many conservatives, and to anti-Soviet dissidents; lately, Tea Party supporters have championed his work. In June, the talk-radio host Glenn Beck, who has supported the Tea Party rebellion, promoted "The Road to Serfdom" on his show; the paperback soon became a No. 1 best-seller on Amazon. (Beck appears to be a fan of the Kochs; in the midst of a recent on-air parody of Al Gore, Beck said, without explanation, "I want to thank Charles Koch for this information." Beck declined to elaborate on the relationship.)

Charles and David also became devotees of a more radical thinker, Robert LeFevre, who favored the abolition of the state but didn't like the label "anarchist"; he called himself an "autarchist." LeFevre liked to say that "government is a disease masquerading as its own cure." In 1956, he opened an institution called the Freedom School, in Colorado Springs. Brian Doherty, of Reason, told me that "LeFevre was an anarchist figure who won Charles's heart," and that the school was "a tiny world of people who thought the New Deal was a horrible mistake." According to diZerega, Charles supported the school financially, and even gave him money to take classes there.

Throughout the seventies, Charles and David continued to build Koch Industries. In 1980, William, with assistance from Freddie, attempted to take over the company from Charles, who, they felt, had assumed autocratic control. In retaliation, the company's board, which answered to Charles, fired William. ("Charles runs it all with an iron hand," Bruce Bartlett, the economist, told me.) Lawsuits were filed, with William and Freddie on one side and Charles and David on the other. In 1983, Charles and David bought out their brothers' share in the company for nearly a billion dollars. But the antagonism remained, and litigation continued for seventeen more years, with the brothers hiring rival private investigators; in 1990, they walked past one another with stony expressions at their mother's funeral. Eventually, Freddie moved to Monaco, which has no income tax. He bought historic estates in France, Austria, and elsewhere, filling them with art, antiques, opera scores, and literary manuscripts. William founded his own energy company, Oxbow, and turned to yachting; he spent an estimated sixty-five million dollars to win the America's Cup, in 1992.

With Charles as the undisputed chairman and C.E.O., Koch Industries expanded rapidly. Roger Altman, who heads the investment-banking firm Evercore, told me that the company's performance has been "beyond phenomenal." Charles remained in Wichita, with his wife and two children, guarding his privacy while supporting community charities. David moved to New York City, where he is an executive vice-president of the company and the C.E.O. of its Chemical Technology Group. A financial expert who knows Koch Industries well told me, "Charles is the company. Charles runs it." David, described by associates as "affable" and "a bit of a lunk," enjoyed for years the life of a wealthy bachelor. He rented a yacht in the South of France and bought a waterfront home in Southampton, where he threw parties that the Web site New York Social Diary likened to an "East Coast version of Hugh Hefner's soirées." In 1996, he married Julia Flesher, a fashion assistant. They live in a nine-thousand-square-foot duplex at 740 Park Avenue, with their three children. Though David's manner is more cosmopolitan, and more genial, than that of Charles, Brian Doherty, who has interviewed both brothers, couldn't think of a single issue on which the brothers disagreed.

As their fortunes grew, Charles and David Koch became the primary underwriters of hard-line libertarian politics in America. Charles's goal, as Doherty described it, was to tear the government "out at the root." The brothers' first major public step came in 1979, when Charles persuaded David, then thirty-nine, to run for public office. They had become supporters of the Libertarian Party, and were backing its Presidential candidate, Ed Clark, who was running against Ronald Reagan from the right. Frustrated by the legal limits on campaign donations, they contrived to place David on the ticket, in the Vice-Presidential slot; upon becoming a candidate, he could lavish as much of his personal fortune as he wished on the campaign. The ticket's slogan was "The Libertarian Party has only one source of funds: You." In fact, its primary source of funds was David Koch, who spent more than two million dollars on the effort.

Many of the ideas propounded in the 1980 campaign presaged the Tea Party movement. Ed Clark told The Nation that libertarians were getting ready to stage "a very big tea party," because people were "sick to death" of taxes. The Libertarian Party platform called for the abolition of the F.B.I. and the C.I.A., as well as of federal regulatory agencies, such as the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Energy. The Party wanted to end Social Security, minimum-wage laws, gun control, and all personal and corporate income taxes; it proposed the legalization of prostitution, recreational drugs, and suicide. Government should be reduced to only one function: the protection of individual rights. William F. Buckley, Jr., a more traditional conservative, called the movement "Anarcho-Totalitarianism."

That November, the Libertarian ticket received only one per cent of the vote. The brothers realized that their brand of politics didn't sell at the ballot box. Charles Koch became openly scornful of conventional politics. "It tends to be a nasty, corrupting business," he told a reporter at the time. "I'm interested in advancing libertarian ideas." According to Doherty's book, the Kochs came to regard elected politicians as merely "actors playing out a script." A longtime confidant of the Kochs told Doherty that the brothers wanted to "supply the themes and words for the scripts." In order to alter the direction of America, they had to "influence the areas where policy ideas percolate from: academia and think tanks."

fter the 1980 election, Charles and David Koch receded from the public arena. But they poured more than a hundred million dollars into dozens of seemingly independent organizations. Tax records indicate that in 2008 the three main Koch family foundations gave money to thirty-four political and policy organizations, three of which they founded, and several of which they direct. The Kochs and their company have given additional millions to political campaigns, advocacy groups, and lobbyists. The family's subterranean financial role has fuelled suspicion on the left; Lee Fang, of the liberal blog ThinkProgress, has called the Kochs "the billionaires behind the hate."

Only the Kochs know precisely how much they have spent on politics. Public tax records show that between 1998 and 2008 the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation spent more than forty-eight million dollars. The Claude R. Lambe Charitable Foundation, which is controlled by Charles Koch and his wife, along with two company employees and an accountant, spent more than twenty-eight million. The David H. Koch Charitable Foundation spent more than a hundred and twenty million. Meanwhile, since 1998 Koch Industries has spent more than fifty million dollars on lobbying. Separately, the company's political-action committee, KochPAC, has donated some eight million dollars to political campaigns, more than eighty per cent of it to Republicans. So far in 2010, Koch Industries leads all other energy companies in political contributions, as it has since 2006. In addition, during the past dozen years the Kochs and other family members have personally spent more than two million dollars on political contributions. In the second quarter of 2010, David Koch was the biggest individual contributor to the Republican Governors Association, with a million-dollar donation. Other gifts by the Kochs may be untraceable; federal tax law permits anonymous personal donations to politically active nonprofit groups.

In recent decades, members of several industrial dynasties have spent parts of their fortunes on a conservative agenda. In the nineteen-eighties, the Olin family, which owns a chemicals-and-manufacturing conglomerate, became known for funding right-leaning thinking in academia, particularly in law schools. And during the nineties Richard Mellon Scaife, a descendant of Andrew Mellon, spent millions attempting to discredit President Bill Clinton. Ari Rabin-Havt, a vice-president at the Democratic-leaning Web site Media Matters, said that the Kochs' effort is unusual, in its marshalling of corporate and personal funds: "Their role, in terms of financial commitments, is staggering."

Of course, Democrats give money, too. Their most prominent donor, the financier George Soros, runs a foundation, the Open Society Institute, that has spent as much as a hundred million dollars a year in America. Soros has also made generous private contributions to various Democratic campaigns, including Obama's. But Michael Vachon, his spokesman, argued that Soros's giving is transparent, and that "none of his contributions are in the service of his own economic interests." The Kochs have given millions of dollars to nonprofit groups that criticize environmental regulation and support lower taxes for industry. Gus diZerega, the former friend, suggested that the Kochs' youthful idealism about libertarianism had largely devolved into a rationale for corporate self-interest. He said of Charles, "Perhaps he has confused making money with freedom."

Some critics have suggested that the Kochs' approach has subverted the purpose of tax-exempt giving. By law, charitable foundations must conduct exclusively nonpartisan activities that promote the public welfare. A 2004 report by the National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy, a watchdog group, described the Kochs' foundations as being self-serving, concluding, "These foundations give money to nonprofit organizations that do research and advocacy on issues that impact the profit margin of Koch Industries."

The Kochs have gone well beyond their immediate self-interest, however, funding organizations that aim to push the country in a libertarian direction. Among the institutions that they have subsidized are the Institute for Justice, which files lawsuits opposing state and federal regulations; the Institute for Humane Studies, which underwrites libertarian academics; and the Bill of Rights

Institute, which promotes a conservative slant on the Constitution. Many of the organizations funded by the Kochs employ specialists who write position papers that are subsequently quoted by politicians and pundits. David Koch has acknowledged that the family exerts tight ideological control. "If we're going to give a lot of money, we'll make darn sure they spend it in a way that goes along with our intent," he told Doherty. "And if they make a wrong turn and start doing things we don't agree with, we withdraw funding."

he Kochs' subsidization of a pro-corporate movement fulfills, in many ways, the vision laid out in a secret 1971 memo that Lewis Powell, then a Virginia attorney, wrote two months before he was nominated to the Supreme Court. The antiwar movement had turned its anger on defense contractors, such as Dow Chemical, and Ralph Nader was leading a public-interest crusade against corporations. Powell, writing a report for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, urged American companies to fight back. The greatest threat to free enterprise, he warned, was not Communism or the New Left but, rather, "respectable elements of society"—intellectuals, journalists, and scientists. To defeat them, he wrote, business leaders needed to wage a long-term, unified campaign to change public opinion.

Charles Koch seems to have approached both business and politics with the deliberation of an engineer. "To bring about social change," he told Doherty, requires "a strategy" that is "vertically and horizontally integrated," spanning "from idea creation to policy development to education to grassroots organizations to lobbying to litigation to political action." The project, he admitted, was extremely ambitious. "We have a radical philosophy," he said.

In 1977, the Kochs provided the funds to launch the nation's first libertarian think tank, the Cato Institute. According to the Center for Public Integrity, between 1986 and 1993 the Koch family gave eleven million dollars to the institute. Today, Cato has more than a hundred full-time employees, and its experts and policy papers are widely quoted and respected by the mainstream media. It describes itself as nonpartisan, and its scholars have at times been critical of both parties. But it has consistently pushed for corporate tax cuts, reductions in social services, and laissez-faire environmental policies.

When President Obama, in a 2008 speech, described the science on global warming as "beyond dispute," the Cato Institute took out a full-page ad in the Times to contradict him. Cato's resident scholars have relentlessly criticized political attempts to stop global warming as expensive, ineffective, and unnecessary. Ed Crane, the Cato Institute's founder and president, told me that "global-warming theories give the government more control of the economy."

Cato scholars have been particularly energetic in promoting the Climategate scandal. Last year, private e-mails of climate scientists at the University of East Anglia, in England, were mysteriously leaked, and their exchanges appeared to suggest a willingness to falsify data in order to buttress the idea that global warming is real. In the two weeks after the e-mails went public, one Cato scholar gave more than twenty media interviews trumpeting the alleged scandal. But five independent inquiries have since exonerated the researchers, and nothing was found in their e-mails or data to discredit the scientific consensus on global warming.

Nevertheless, the controversy succeeded in spreading skepticism about climate change. Even though the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration recently issued a report concluding that the evidence for global warming is unequivocal, more Americans are convinced than at any time since 1997 that scientists have exaggerated the seriousness of global warming. The Kochs promote this statistic on their company's Web site but do not mention the role that their funding has played in fostering such doubt.

In a 2002 memo, the Republican political consultant Frank Luntz wrote that so long as "voters believe there is no consensus about global warming within the scientific community" the status quo would prevail. The key for opponents of environmental reform, he said, was to question the science—a public-relations strategy that the tobacco industry used effectively for years to forestall regulation. The Kochs have funded many sources of environmental skepticism, such as the Heritage Foundation, which has argued that "scientific facts gathered in the past 10 years do not support the notion of catastrophic human-made warming." The brothers have given money to more obscure groups, too, such as the Independent Women's Forum, which opposes the presentation of global warming as a scientific fact in American public schools. Until 2008, the group was run by Nancy Pfotenhauer, a former lobbyist for Koch Industries. Mary Beth Jarvis, a vice-president of a Koch subsidiary, is on the group's board.

Naomi Oreskes, a professor of history and science studies at the University of California, San Diego, is the co-author of "Merchants of Doubt," a new book that chronicles various attempts by American industry to manipulate public opinion on science. She noted that the Kochs, as the heads of "a company with refineries and pipelines," have "a lot at stake." She added, "If the answer is to phase out fossil fuels, a different group of people are going to be making money, so we shouldn't be surprised that they're fighting tooth and nail."

David Koch told New York that he was unconvinced that global warming has been caused by human activity. Even if it has been, he said, the heating of the planet will be beneficial, resulting in longer growing seasons in the Northern Hemisphere. "The Earth will be able to support enormously more people because far greater land area will be available to produce food," he said.

n the mid-eighties, the Kochs provided millions of dollars to George Mason University, in Arlington, Virginia, to set up another think tank. Now known as the Mercatus Center, it promotes itself as "the world's premier university source for market-oriented ideas—bridging the gap between academic ideas and real-world problems." Financial records show that the Koch family foundations have contributed more than thirty million dollars to George Mason, much of which has gone to the Mercatus Center, a nonprofit organization. "It's ground zero for deregulation policy in Washington," Rob Stein, the Democratic strategist, said. It is an unusual arrangement. "George Mason is a public university, and receives public funds," Stein noted. "Virginia is hosting an institution that the Kochs practically control."

The founder of the Mercatus Center is Richard Fink, formerly an economist. Fink heads Koch Industries' lobbying operation in Washington. In addition, he is the president of the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation, the president of the Claude R. Lambe Charitable Foundation, a director of the Fred C. and Mary R. Koch Foundation, and a director and co-founder, with David Koch, of the Americans for Prosperity Foundation.

Fink, with his many titles, has become the central nervous system of the Kochtopus. He appears to have supplanted Ed Crane, the head of the Cato Institute, as the brothers' main political lieutenant. Though David remains on the board at Cato, Charles Koch has fallen out with Crane. Associates suggested to me that Crane had been insufficiently respectful of Charles's management philosophy, which he distilled into a book called "The Science of Success," and trademarked under the name Market-Based Management, or M.B.M. In the book, Charles recommends instilling a company's corporate culture with the competitiveness of the marketplace. Koch describes M.B.M. as a "holistic system" containing "five dimensions: vision, virtue and talents, knowledge processes, decision rights and incentives." A top Cato Institute official told me that Charles "thinks he's a genius. He's the emperor, and he's convinced he's wearing clothes." Fink, by contrast, has been far more embracing of Charles's ideas. (Fink, like the Kochs, declined to be interviewed.)

At a 1995 conference for philanthropists, Fink adopted the language of economics when speaking about the Mercatus Center's purpose. He said that grant-makers should use think tanks and political-action groups to convert intellectual raw materials into policy "products."

The Wall Street Journal has called the Mercatus Center "the most important think tank you've never heard of," and noted that fourteen of the twenty-three regulations that President George W. Bush placed on a "hit list" had been suggested first by Mercatus scholars. Fink told the paper that the Kochs have "other means of fighting [their] battles," and that the Mercatus Center does not actively promote the company's private interests. But Thomas McGarity, a law professor at the University of Texas, who specializes in environmental issues, told me that "Koch has been constantly in trouble with the E.P.A., and Mercatus has constantly hammered on the agency." An environmental lawyer who has clashed with the Mercatus Center called it "a means of laundering economic aims." The lawyer explained the strategy: "You take corporate money and give it to a neutral-sounding think tank," which "hires people with pedigrees and academic degrees who put out credible-seeming studies. But they all coincide perfectly with the economic interests of their funders."

In 1997, for instance, the E.P.A. moved to reduce surface ozone, a form of pollution caused, in part, by emissions from oil refineries. Susan Dudley, an economist who became a top official at the Mercatus Center, criticized the proposed rule. The E.P.A., she argued, had not taken into account that smog-free skies would result in more cases of skin cancer. She projected that if pollution were controlled it would cause up to eleven thousand additional cases of skin cancer each year.

In 1999, the District of Columbia Circuit Court took up Dudley's smog argument. Evaluating the E.P.A. rule, the court found that the E.P.A. had "explicitly disregarded" the "possible health benefits of ozone." In another part of the opinion, the court ruled, 2-1, that the E.P.A. had overstepped its authority in calibrating standards for ozone emissions. As the Constitutional Accountability Center, a think tank, revealed, the judges in the majority had previously attended legal junkets, on a Montana ranch, that were arranged by the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment—a group funded by Koch family foundations. The judges have claimed that the ruling was unaffected by their attendance.

deas don't happen on their own," Matt Kibbe, the president of FreedomWorks, a Tea Party advocacy group, told me. "Throughout history, ideas need patrons." The

Koch brothers, after helping to create Cato and Mercatus, concluded that think tanks alone were not enough to effect change. They needed a mechanism to deliver those ideas to the street, and to attract the public's support. In 1984, David Koch and Richard Fink created yet another organization, and Kibbe joined them. The group, Citizens for a Sound Economy, seemed like a grassroots movement, but according to the Center for Public Integrity it was sponsored principally by the Kochs, who provided $7.9 million between 1986 and 1993. Its mission, Kibbe said, "was to take these heavy ideas and translate them for mass America. . . . We read the same literature Obama did about nonviolent revolutions—Saul Alinsky, Gandhi, Martin Luther King. We studied the idea of the Boston Tea Party as an example of nonviolent social change. We learned we needed boots on the ground to sell ideas, not candidates." Within a few years, the group had mobilized fifty paid field workers, in twenty-six states, to rally voters behind the Kochs' agenda. David and Charles, according to one participant, were "very controlling, very top down. You can't build an organization with them. They run it."

Around this time, the brothers faced a political crisis. In 1989, the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs investigated their business and released a scathing report accusing Koch Oil of "a widespread and sophisticated scheme to steal crude oil from Indians and others through fraudulent mismeasuring." The Kochs admitted that they had improperly taken thirty-one million dollars' worth of crude oil, but said that it had been accidental. Charles Koch told committee investigators that oil measurement is "a very uncertain art."

To defend its reputation, Koch Industries hired Robert Strauss, then a premier Washington lobbyist; the company soon opened an office in the city. A grand jury was convened to investigate the allegations, but it eventually disbanded, without issuing criminal charges. According to the Senate report, after the committee hearings Koch operatives delved into the personal lives of committee staffers, even questioning an ex-wife. Senate investigators were upset by the Kochs' tactics. Kenneth Ballen, the counsel to the Senate committee, said, "These people have amassed such unaccountable power!"

By 1993, when Bill Clinton became President, Citizens for a Sound Economy had become a prototype for the kind of corporate-backed opposition campaigns that have proliferated during the Obama era. The group waged a successful assault on Clinton's proposed B.T.U. tax on energy, for instance, running advertisements, staging media events, and targeting opponents. And it mobilized anti-tax rallies outside the Capitol—rallies that NPR described as "designed to strike fear into the hearts of wavering Democrats." Dan Glickman, a former Democratic congressman from Wichita, who supported the B.T.U. tax, recalled, "I'd been in Congress eighteen years. The Kochs actually engaged against me and funded my opponent. They used a lot of resources and effort--their employees, too." Glickman suffered a surprise defeat. "I can't prove it, but I think I was probably their victim," he said.

The Kochs continued to disperse their money, creating slippery organizations with generic-sounding names, and this made it difficult to ascertain the extent of their influence in Washington. In 1990, Citizens for a Sound Economy created a spinoff group, Citizens for the Environment, which called acid rain and other environmental problems "myths." When the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette investigated the matter, it discovered that the spinoff group had "no citizen membership of its own."

In 1997, another Senate investigation began looking into what a minority report called "an audacious plan to pour millions of dollars in contributions into Republican campaigns nationwide without disclosing the amount or source," in order to evade campaign-finance laws. A shell corporation, Triad Management, had paid more than three million dollars for attack ads in twenty-six House races and three Senate races. More than half of the advertising money came from an obscure nonprofit group, the Economic Education Trust. The Senate committee's minority report suggested that "the trust was financed in whole or in part by Charles and David Koch of Wichita, Kansas." The brothers were suspected of having secretly paid for the attack ads, most of which aired in states where Koch Industries did business. In Kansas, where Triad Management was especially active, the funds may have played a decisive role in four of six federal races. The Kochs, when asked by reporters if they had given the money, refused to comment. In 1998, however, the Wall Street Journal confirmed that a consultant on the Kochs' payroll had been involved in the scheme. Charles Lewis, of the Center for Public Integrity, described the scandal as "historic. Triad was the first time a major corporation used a cutout"—a front operation—"in a threatening way. Koch Industries was the poster child of a company run amok."

uring the Clinton Administration, the energy industry faced increased scrutiny and regulation. In the mid-nineties, the Justice Department filed two lawsuits against Koch Industries, claiming that it was responsible for more than three hundred oil spills, which had released an estimated three million gallons of oil into lakes and rivers. The penalty was potentially as high as two hundred and fourteen million dollars. In a settlement, Koch Industries paid a record thirty-million-dollar civil fine, and agreed to spend five million dollars on environmental projects.

In 1999, a jury found Koch Industries guilty of negligence and malice in the deaths of two Texas teen-agers in an explosion that resulted from a leaky underground butane pipeline. (In 2001, the company paid an undisclosed settlement.) And in the final months of the Clinton Presidency the Justice Department levelled a ninety-seven-count indictment against the company, for covering up the discharge of ninety-one tons of benzene, a carcinogen, from its refinery in Corpus Christi, Texas. The company was liable for three hundred and fifty million dollars in fines, and four Koch employees faced up to thirty-five years in prison. The Koch Petroleum Group eventually pleaded guilty to one criminal charge of covering up environmental violations, including the falsification of documents, and paid a twenty-million-dollar fine. David Uhlmann, a career prosecutor who, at the time, headed the environmental-crimes section at the Justice Department, described the suit as "one of the most significant cases ever brought under the Clean Air Act." He added, "Environmental crimes are almost always motivated by economics and arrogance, and in the Koch case there was a healthy dose of both."

During the 2000 election campaign, Koch Industries spent some nine hundred thousand dollars to support the candidacies of George W. Bush and other Republicans. During the Bush years, Koch Industries and other fossil-fuel companies enjoyed remarkable prosperity. The 2005 energy bill, which Hillary Clinton dubbed the Dick Cheney Lobbyist Energy Bill, offered enormous subsidies and tax breaks for energy companies. The Kochs have cast themselves as deficit hawks, but, according to a study by Media Matters, their companies have benefitted from nearly a hundred million dollars in government contracts since 2000.

In 2004, Citizens for a Sound Economy was accused of illegitimately throwing its weight behind Bush's reëlection. The group's Oregon branch had attempted to get Ralph Nader on the Presidential ballot, in order to dilute Democratic support for John Kerry. Critics argued that it was illegal for a tax-exempt nonprofit organization to donate its services for partisan political purposes. (A complaint was filed with the Federal Election Commission; it was dismissed.)

That year, internal rivalries at Citizens for a Sound Economy caused the organization to split apart. David Koch and Fink started a new group, Americans for Prosperity, and they hired Tim Phillips to run it. Phillips was a political veteran who had worked with Ralph Reed, the evangelical leader and Republican activist, co-founding Century Strategies, a campaign-consulting company that became notorious for its ties to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Phillips's online biography describes him as an expert in "grasstops" and "grassroots" political organizing. The Kochs' choice of Phillips signalled an even greater toughness. The conservative operative Grover Norquist, who is known for praising "throat slitters" in politics, called Phillips "a grownup who can make things happen."

Last year, Phillips told the Financial Times that Americans for Prosperity had only eight thousand registered members. Currently, its Web site claims that the group has "1.2 million activists." Whatever its size, the Kochs' political involvement has been intense; a former employee of the Cato Institute told me that Americans for Prosperity "was micromanaged by the Kochs." And the brothers' investment may well have paid off: Americans for Prosperity, in concert with the family's other organizations, has been instrumental in disrupting the Obama Presidency.

In January, 2008, Charles Koch wrote in his company newsletter that America could be on the verge of "the greatest loss of liberty and prosperity since the 1930s." That October, Americans for Prosperity held a conference of conservative operatives at a Marriott hotel outside Washington. Erick Erickson, the editor-in-chief of the conservative blog RedState.com, took the lectern, thanked David Koch, and vowed to "unite and fight . . . the armies of the left!" Soon after Obama assumed office, Americans for Prosperity launched "Porkulus" rallies against Obama's stimulus-spending measures. Then the Mercatus Center released a report claiming that stimulus funds had been directed disproportionately toward Democratic districts; eventually, the author was forced to correct the report, but not before Rush Limbaugh, citing the paper, had labelled Obama's program "a slush fund," and Fox News and other conservative outlets had echoed the sentiment. (Phil Kerpen, the vice-president for policy at Americans for Prosperity, is a contributor to the Fox News Web site. Another officer at Americans for Prosperity, Walter Williams, often guest-hosts for Limbaugh.) Americans for Prosperity also created an offshoot, Patients United Now, which organized what Phillips has estimated to be more than three hundred rallies against health-care reform. At one rally, an effigy of a Democratic congressman was hung; at another, protesters unfurled a banner depicting corpses from Dachau. The group also helped organize the "Kill the Bill" protests outside the Capitol, in March, where Democratic supporters of health-care reform alleged that they were spat on and cursed at. Phillips was a featured speaker.

Americans for Prosperity has held at least eighty events targeting cap-and-trade legislation, which is aimed at making industries pay for the air pollution that they create. Speakers for the group claimed, with exaggeration, that even back-yard barbecues and kitchen stoves would be taxed. The group was also involved in the attacks on Obama's "green jobs" czar, Van Jones, and waged a crusade against international climate talks. Casting his group as a champion of ordinary workers who would be hurt by environmentalists, Phillips went to Copenhagen last year and staged a protest outside the United Nations conference on climate change, declaring, "We're a grassroots organization. . . . I think it's unfortunate when wealthy children of wealthy families . . . want to send unemployment rates in the United States up to twenty per cent."

Grover Norquist, who holds a weekly meeting for conservative leaders in Washington, including representatives from Americans for Prosperity, told me that last summer's raucous rallies were pivotal in undermining Obama's agenda. The Republican leadership in Congress, he said, "couldn't have done it without August, when people went out on the streets. It discouraged deal-makers"—Republicans who might otherwise have worked constructively with Obama. Moreover, the appearance of growing public opposition to Obama affected corporate donors on K Street. "K Street is a three-billion-dollar weathervane," Norquist said. "When Obama was strong, the Chamber of Commerce said, 'We can work with the Obama Administration.' But that changed when thousands of people went into the street and 'terrorized' congressmen. August is what changed it. Now that Obama is weak, people are getting tough."

As the first anniversary of Obama's election approached, David Koch came to the Washington area to attend a triumphant Americans for Prosperity gathering. Obama's poll numbers were falling fast. Not a single Republican senator was working with the Administration on health care, or much else. Pundits were writing about Obama's political ineptitude, and Tea Party groups were accusing the President of initiating "a government takeover." In a speech, Koch said, "Days like today bring to reality the vision of our board of directors when we started this organization, five years ago." He went on, "We envisioned a mass movement, a state-based one, but national in scope, of hundreds of thousands of American citizens from all walks of life standing up and fighting for the economic freedoms that made our nation the most prosperous society in history. . . . Thankfully, the stirrings from California to Virginia, and from Texas to Michigan, show that more and more of our fellow-citizens are beginning to see the same truths as we do."

While Koch didn't explicitly embrace the Tea Party movement that day, more recently he has come close to doing so, praising it for demonstrating the "powerful visceral hostility in the body politic against the massive increase in government power, the massive efforts to socialize this country." Charles Koch, in a newsletter sent to his seventy thousand employees, compared the Obama Administration to the regime of the Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez. The Kochs' sense of imperilment is somewhat puzzling. Income inequality in America is greater than it has been since the nineteen-twenties, and since the seventies the tax rates of the wealthiest have fallen more than those of the middle class. Yet the brothers' message has evidently resonated with voters: a recent poll found that fifty-five per cent of Americans agreed that Obama is a socialist. Americans for Prosperity, meanwhile, has announced that it will spend an additional forty-five million dollars before the midterm elections, in November. Although the group is legally prohibited from directly endorsing candidates, it nonetheless plans to target some fifty House races and half a dozen Senate races, staging rallies, organizing door-to-door canvassing, and running ads aimed at "educating voters about where candidates stand."

Though the Kochs have slowed Obama's momentum, their larger political battle is far from won. Richard Fink, interviewed by FrumForum.com this spring, said, "If you look at where we've gone from the year 2000 to now, with the expansion of government spending and a debt burden that threatens to bankrupt the country, it doesn't look very good at all." He went on, "It looks like the infrastructure that was built and nurtured has not carried the day." He suggested that the Kochs needed "to get more into the practical, day-to-day issues of governing."

n 1991, David Koch was badly injured in a plane crash in Los Angeles. He was the sole passenger in first class to survive. As he was recovering, a routine physical exam led to the discovery of prostate cancer. Koch received treatment, settled down, started a family, and reconsidered his life. As he told Portfolio, "When you're the only one who survived in the front of the plane and everyone else died—yeah, you think, 'My God, the good Lord spared me for some greater purpose.' My joke is that I've been busy ever since, doing all the good work I can think of, so He can have confidence in me."

Koch began giving spectacularly large donations to the arts and sciences. And he became a patron of cancer research, focussing on prostate cancer. In addition to his gifts to Sloan-Kettering, he gave fifteen million dollars to New York-Presbyterian Hospital, a hundred and twenty-five million to M.I.T. for cancer research, twenty million to Johns Hopkins University, and twenty-five million to the M. D. Anderson Cancer Center, in Houston. In response to his generosity, Sloan-Kettering gave Koch its Excellence in Corporate Leadership Award. In 2004, President Bush named him to the National Cancer Advisory Board, which guides the National Cancer Institute.

Koch's corporate and political roles, however, may pose conflicts of interest. For example, at the same time that David Koch has been casting himself as a champion in the fight against cancer, Koch Industries has been lobbying to prevent the E.P.A. from classifying formaldehyde, which the company produces in great quantities, as a "known carcinogen" in humans.

Scientists have long known that formaldehyde causes cancer in rats, and several major scientific studies have concluded that formaldehyde causes cancer in human beings—including one published last year by the National Cancer Institute, on whose advisory board Koch sits. The study tracked twenty-five thousand patients for an average of forty years; subjects exposed to higher amounts of formaldehyde had significantly higher rates of leukemia. These results helped lead an expert panel within the National Institutes of Health to conclude that formaldehyde should be categorized as a known carcinogen, and be strictly controlled by the government. Corporations have resisted regulations on formaldehyde for decades, however, and Koch Industries has been a large funder of members of Congress who have stymied the E.P.A., requiring it to defer new regulations until more studies are completed.

Koch Industries became a major producer of the chemical in 2005, after it bought Georgia-Pacific, the paper and wood-products company, for twenty-one billion dollars. Georgia-Pacific manufactures formaldehyde in its chemical division, and uses it to produce various wood products, such as plywood and laminates. Its annual production capacity for formaldehyde is 2.2 billion pounds. Last December, Traylor Champion, Georgia-Pacific's vice-president of environmental affairs, sent a formal letter of protest to federal health authorities. He wrote that the company "strongly disagrees" with the N.I.H. panel's conclusion that formaldehyde should be treated as a known human carcinogen. David Koch did not recuse himself from the National Cancer Advisory Board, or divest himself of company stock, while his company was directly lobbying the government to keep formaldehyde on the market. (A board spokesperson said that the issue of formaldehyde had not come up.)

James Huff, an associate director at the National Institute for Environmental Health Sciences, a division of the N.I.H., told me that it was "disgusting" for Koch to be serving on the National Cancer Advisory Board: "It's just not good for public health. Vested interests should not be on the board." He went on, "Those boards are very important. They're very influential as to whether N.C.I. goes into formaldehyde or not. Billions of dollars are involved in formaldehyde."

Harold Varmus, the director of the National Cancer Institute, knows David Koch from Memorial Sloan-Kettering, which he used to run. He said that, at Sloan-Kettering, "a lot of people who gave to us had large business interests. The one thing we wouldn't tolerate in our board members is tobacco." When told of Koch Industries' stance on formaldehyde, Varmus said that he was "surprised."

he David H. Koch Hall of Human Origins, at the Smithsonian's National Museum of Natural History, is a multimedia exploration of the theory that mankind evolved in response to climate change. At the main entrance, viewers are confronted with a giant graph charting the Earth's temperature over the past ten million years, which notes that it is far cooler now than it was ten thousand years ago. Overhead, the text reads, "HUMANS EVOLVED IN RESPONSE TO A CHANGING WORLD." The message, as amplified by the exhibit's Web site, is that "key human adaptations evolved in response to environmental instability." Only at the end of the exhibit, under the headline "OUR SURVIVAL CHALLENGE," is it noted that levels of carbon dioxide are higher now than they have ever been, and that they are projected to increase dramatically in the next century. No cause is given for this development; no mention is made of any possible role played by fossil fuels. The exhibit makes it seem part of a natural continuum. The accompanying text says, "During the period in which humans evolved, Earth's temperature and the amount of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere fluctuated together." An interactive game in the exhibit suggests that humans will continue to adapt to climate change in the future. People may build "underground cities," developing "short, compact bodies" or "curved spines," so that "moving around in tight spaces will be no problem."

Such ideas uncannily echo the Koch message. The company's January newsletter to employees, for instance, argues that "fluctuations in the earth's climate predate humanity," and concludes, "Since we can't control Mother Nature, let's figure out how to get along with her changes." Joseph Romm, a physicist who runs the Web site ClimateProgress.org, is infuriated by the Smithsonian's presentation. "The whole exhibit whitewashes the modern climate issue," he said. "I think the Kochs wanted to be seen as some sort of high-minded company, associated with the greatest natural-history and science museum in the country.

But the truth is, the exhibit is underwritten by big-time polluters, who are underground funders of action to stop efforts to deal with this threat to humanity. I think the Smithsonian should have drawn the line."

Cristián Samper, the museum's director, said that the exhibit is not about climate change, and described Koch as "one of the best donors we've had, in my tenure here, because he's very interested in the content, but completely hands off." He noted, "I don't know all the details of his involvement in other issues."

The Kochs have long depended on the public's not knowing all the details about them. They have been content to operate what David Koch has called "the largest company that you've never heard of." But with the growing prominence of the Tea Party, and with increased awareness of the Kochs' ties to the movement, the brothers may find it harder to deflect scrutiny. Recently, President Obama took aim at the Kochs' political network. Speaking at a Democratic National Committee fund-raiser, in Austin, he warned supporters that the Supreme Court's recent ruling in the Citizens United case—which struck down laws prohibiting direct corporate spending on campaigns—had made it even easier for big companies to hide behind "groups with harmless-sounding names like Americans for Prosperity." Obama said, "They don't have to say who, exactly, Americans for Prosperity are. You don't know if it's a foreign-controlled corporation"—or even, he added, "a big oil company." ♦

H: When Madeleine first became Secretary of State, I organized a group of people for her to discuss the anniversary of the Marshall Plan to prepare her for her speech. Some were younger, but most were like [redacted] etc. We had a long dinner. It was, I think, fruitful for her. (I recall Greg Craig there, then as head of Policy Planning.) There are a lot of people not in government who have expertise and judgment that are not being tapped, some of them younger. There are of course a number of people who have not been tapped into the administration and wish to be. [redacted] for example, is someone I've talked with recently, who very much wants to serve as an ambassador or in some capacity.) [redacted], whom I mentioned, and whose CV [redacted] I've included below, is someone who is very knowledgeable, tough minded, has ideas, and is capable, in his 40s. He's the kind of person who might be considered to succeed Anne-Marie Slaughter. There are others out there: [redacted] for example, who you may remember [redacted] is incredibly effective, but has been kept out of this administration because as a lawyer he's had to register as a lobbyist. He's one of many. Really counter-productive to develop such self-undermining rules. [redacted] thinks hard about diplomacy, and we've been in conversation about how to develop these ideas further. The younger generation is interesting. [redacted] is worth paying attention to, among them. More to discuss. Sid

Colleagues:

Further to our earlier alert, the press is widely reporting Somali gunmen disguised in army uniforms stormed a hotel popular with government officials on Tuesday, and a legislator said at least 15 parliamentarians were killed. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

The African Union confirmed at least 15 people were killed in the attack on the Huna Hotel, in a government-controlled neighborhood between the presidential palace and the Indian Ocean. It did not say whether the dead were all MPs.

Embassy Nairobi spoke with President Sheikh Sharif who confirmed that seven MPs are now dead and numerous others are wounded. The number of attackers is not clear, but they were dressed in Transitional Federal Government military uniforms. At least two blew themselves up.

> "He will tell you that he wants a strong authority to take from him the crushing responsibility of thinking for himself. Since the Republic is weak, he is led to break the law out of love for obedience. But is it really strong authority that he wishes? In reality he demands rigorous order for others, and for himself disorder without responsibility." --

I am not sure when I first detected the noxious fumes that would envelop the conservative movement in the Obama era. It might have been early on, in April 2009, when I visited a series of gun shows in rural California and Nevada. Perusing tables piled high with high-caliber semi-automatic weapons and chatting with anyone in my vicinity, I heard urgent warnings of mass roundups, concentration camps, and a socialist government in Washington. "These people that are purchasing these guns are people that are worried about what's going on in this country," a gun dealer told me outside a show in Reno. "Good luck Obama," a young gun enthusiast remarked to me. "We outnumber him 100 to 1." At this time, the Tea Party movement had not even registered on the national media's radar.

In September 2009, I led a panel discussion about this book inside an auditorium filled with nearly 100 students and faculty at the University of California-Riverside. Beside me sat Jonathan Walton, an African-American professor of religious studies and prolific writer, and Mark Takano, an erudite, openly gay former Democratic congressional candidate and local community college trustee. In the middle of our discussion, a dozen College Republicans stormed the front of the stage with signs denouncing me as a "left-wing hack" while a hysterical young man leaped from the crowd, blowing kisses mockingly at Takano while heckling Walton as a "racist." Afterward, university police officers insisted on escorting me to my ride after the right-wing heckler attempted to follow me as he shouted threats.

Who was this stalker? Just a concerned citizen worried about taxes? His name was Ryan Sorba and he was an operative of a heavily funded national conservative youth outfit, the Intercollegiate Studies Institute. Besides founding dozens of Republican youth groups across the country, Sorba has devoted an exceptional amount of energy to his interest in homosexuals. His intellectual output consists of a tract titled The Born Gay Hoax, arguing that homosexuality is at once a curable disease and a bogus trend manufactured by academic leftists. Adding to his credentials, Sorba has a history of run-ins with the law, he explained when I called him about the order.

My encounter with this aggressive right-wing cadre seemed a strange, isolated event. But the hostility turned out to be symptomatic of the intensifying campaign to delegitimize President Obama and his allies in Congress. The Right's days of rage were only beginning.

Through his first year in office, Obama seemed oblivious to the threat of the far right. He campaigned against partisanship, declaring that there were "no red states" and no "conservative America." Apparently, he thought it was merely a contrivance or myth that there were people who rejected science, demonized gays, assailed minority and women's rights -- or that they genuinely believed in what they said.

Speaking of changing Washington, Obama seemed to think that the entire history of politics since the rise of Reagan and the Right and their strategies of polarization was not deeply rooted but a superficial problem attributable to certain "divisive" personalities, easily wiped away with gestures toward bipartisanship. His view of the parties was that they were simply mirror images sharing fundamental beliefs but separated by "partisans." The skilled and devoted community organizer could bring them together. Many of his supporters in the media, often part and parcel of political wars over the years, reinforced and amplified his innocence, proclaiming he was the one at last who could "bridge the partisan divide." Andrew Sullivan, a disaffected conservative who once called critics of George W. Bush policies "fifth columnists" but now fervently supporting Obama, wrote that the new president was destined to become "a liberal Reagan who can reunite America." This optimism pervaded the Obama White House as the president and his aides sought out Republicans willing to vote for his programs. After all, why couldn't we all just get along?

In his autobiographical book The Audacity of Hope, Obama highlighted a key component of his political strategy: "I serve as a blank screen on which people of vastly different political stripes project their own views." Once he was elected, conservatives concluded that they could reverse Obama's strength by transforming him into a human tableau for the most fearsome images they could conjure.

Obama's multiracial background was crucial in cultivating resentment among the shock troops. Those who rejected Obama's legitimacy to serve as president on the basis of his background gave birth to the "Birther" movement that sought to challenge his citizenship. The movement's most visible figure, and therefore the most eccentric, was Orly Taitz, a dentist and self-trained lawyer who had immigrated from the former Soviet republican of Moldova to Israel before settling in the conservative bastion of Orange County, California. Convinced by claims on the far-right Web site WorldNetDaily that Obama planned to create a "civilian national security force," Taitz told me she "realized that Obama was another Stalin--it's a cross between Stalinist USSR and Hitler's Germany."

After becoming transfixed by online conspiracy theories claiming Obama's family had forged his birth certificate in Hawaii, Taitz snapped into action. She filed a lawsuit in November 2008 with California Secretary of State Debra Bowen demanding an investigation into Obama's eligibility to serve as president. Taitz's plaintiff in the case was Wiley Drake, an Orange County radio preacher and former second vice president of the Southern Baptist Convention who once publicly prayed for Obama's death. While her lawsuit went nowhere, and subsequent suits earned her angry rebukes from judges, Taitz became an instant media sensation, delivering heavily accented screeds against Obama before friendly interviewers from Sean Hannity to CNN's Lou Dobbs, who Taitz called her "greatest supporter" and who was eventually fired as an indirect result of his hosting of her.

In March 2009, Texas Rep. Randy Neugebauer signed on to a Birther bill proposing that future presidential candidates must prove their citizenship before becoming eligible to campaign. The Birther movement had found its voice in government and made an indelible impact on the Republican grassroots. By June 2009, 28 percent of Republican respondents to a Kos/Research 2000 poll said they thought Obama wasn't born in the United States, while 30 percent "weren't sure." "Obama should be in the Big House," Taitz shrieked to me, "not the White House!"

When Obama announced health care reform as the first major initiative of his administration, the conservative movement activated a campaign of demonization -- transformational politics -- designed to turn Obama into the "Other," making him seem as unfamiliar, and therefore as threatening, as possible. When the president urged the Congress to deliver a health care reform bill in 2009, the Right staged a living theater of political hatred, Obama's dream of bipartisanship transformed into a nightmarish version of "Marat/Sade." On September 12, 2009, tens of thousands of far-right activists belonging to a loose confederation of anti-government groups called the Tea Party Patriots converged on Washington's National Mall for a giant protest against the Obama health care plan. The date was significant: Fox News's top-ranked talk show host Glenn Beck had declared the birth of the "9-12 Project" to restore the sense of unity -- and siege mentality -- that Americans experienced on September 11, 2001. But this time, Obama -- not Osama -- was the enemy.

While covering the rally, I witnessed sign after sign declaring Obama a greater danger to America's security than al-Qaida; demonstrators held images that juxtaposed Obama's face with images of evildoers from Hitler to Pol Pot to Bin Laden; others carried signs questioning Obama's status as a U.S. citizen. "We can fight al-Qaida, we can't kill Obama," said an aging demonstrator. Another told me, "Obama is the biggest Nazi in the world," pointing to placards he had fashioned depicting Obama and House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi in SS outfits. According to another activist, Obama's agenda was similar to Hitler's: "Hitler took over the banking industry, did he not? And Hitler had his own personal secret service police. [The community-organizing group] ACORN is an extension of that."

The seemingly incongruous Tea Party propaganda recalled signs waved by right-wing Jewish settlers during rallies against Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his support of the peace process, portraying him as an SS officer and as the French collaborator Marshall Petain. In 1995, amid the provocative atmosphere, a young right-wing Jewish zealot assassinated Rabin.

The Israeli tragedy was a cautionary example of targeted hatred leading to violence.

Members of the Tea Party "Patriots" did not seem to care that their rhetoric was irrational, or that comparing Obama to Hitler and Stalin was contradictory and obviously hyperbolic. Their motives were entirely negative. By purging government of the multicultural evil that had seized power through illicit means (several activists told me they believed ACORN helped Obama steal the election), they were convinced that a mythical golden American yesteryear would return. They had no interest in building anything new or even articulating an agenda, much less discussing the merits of policies. The Tea Party's primary concern was cultural purification -- freedom from, not freedom to. Against the dark image of the president and his liberal allies, Tea Party activists defined themselves as the children of light. The racial subtext was always transparent.

The Tea Party's strategy rested on a guerrilla campaign of chaos and sabotage designed not only to intimidate Democrats but also to disorient independent voters who might have supported health care reform. The Tea Partiers were convinced this would be an easy feat, since they believed the majority of the country was on their side -- that they represented the "Real America." At the 9-12 rally Matt Kibbe, one of the march organizers, told the crowd that ABC News was reporting that 1 million to 1.5 million people were in attendance, something ABC denied, saying

"ABCNews.com reported an approximate figure of 60,000 to 70,000 protesters." Then Armey led the crowd in a chant of "Freedom works! Freedom works!" Unknown to most of the Tea Partiers, they were intoning the name of a corporate-funded Beltway advocacy group, not the battle cry of Mel Gibson William Wallace in Braveheart.

Contrary to its image as a grassroots movement mobilized to stifle the machinations of Washington elites, the Tea Party movement was the creation of a constellation of industry-funded conservative groups with close Republican ties. The movement's leading puppet-master was Dick Armey, who directed resources and talking points to the Tea Party "Patriots" from his Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group, FreedomWorks. Among the corporate clients of Armey's lobbying firm, which he was forced to leave as a result of his involvement in the Tea Parties, was the pharmaceutical giant Bristol Myers Squibb, a company with a clear interest in defeating health care reform. (Armey's other "real American" clients included the Marxist terror cult, People's Mojahedin of Iran, which received funding and assistance from Saddam Hussein in order to launch terrorist strikes throughout the 1990's against Iranian civilian targets.) Armey collected a consulting fee of $250,000 directly from FreedomWorks and $300,000 from allied astroturf front groups. FreedomWorks paid out much of its money to an assortment of Republican political consultants.

If Armey was the Tea Party king,

Sarah Palin was eager to be crowned the Tea Party queen. Just days after Obama's inauguration, Palin abruptly quit her job as Alaskan governor to vie for the honor. Palin's motives for quitting became clear when she inked a lucrative deal to write her political memoir Going Rogue, signed on as a regular contributor to Fox News, and received $1 million an episode for a reality show on cable television, "Sarah Palin's Alaska." Palin's book tour, which sent her through Middle America in a luxuriously outfitted bus, resembled both a presidential campaign and a traveling carnival.

Whether or not Palin intends to run for president, her growing media presence has magnified her influence within the Republican Party. Yet the ever-expanding Palin phenomenon was greeted with hostility by Republican politicos desperately seeking to expand the party's base after the drubbing in 2008. Former McCain campaign manager Steve Schmidt warned that Palin's nomination in 2012 would be "catastrophic" for the GOP. His doomsday prediction was backed by an October Gallup poll revealing her as one of the most polarizing and unpopular political figures in the country with a disapproval rating of over 50 percent. Unfortunately for Schmidt and other party pragmatists, those who approve of Palin represent the heartbeat of the Republican Party, its most fervent activists, and cannot be dissuaded from following her, even if she is leading the party off a cliff.

A November 2009 special congressional election in New York's heavily Republican 23rd district was the first major test of Palin's power. Along with a parade of nationally recognized conservatives, Palin endorsed Doug Hoffman, an unknown far-right third-party candidate closely allied with the Tea Party, helping to force a popular moderate Republican politician, Dede Scozzafava, from the race. In the end, Palin's ideological purge in upstate New York led to an improbable Democratic victory, the first in that district in more than 100 years. After the disaster Palin and her allies claimed victory, insisting they had at least hastened the purge of ideologically impure Republicans from the party. She went on to endorse Rand Paul, the son of right-wing libertarian Rep. Ron Paul and a candidate in Kentucky's GOP senatorial primary, while Dick Cheney went out of his way to endorse Rand's regular Republican opponent, Trey Grayson, the Kentucky secretary of state.

Following the Tea Party script of avoiding social issues like abortion and gay marriage in order to obscure the large presence of the Christian Right within the movement's ranks, the self-described "hardcore pro-lifer" Palin recast herself as a libertarian concerned primarily with issues of "economic freedom." She claimed the Democratic "cap and trade" plan to limit carbon emissions would harm the livelihood of blue-collar workers, and she assailed health care reform as a Trojan Horse for "socialism" (though she admitted her family "used to hustle over the border" to take advantage of Canada's single-payer health care system). But no Palin attack had as much effect as the one she blasted out on her Facebook page claiming the Obama health care plan included a provision for "death panels" that would recommend euthanasia for severely ill patients like her Down syndrome-afflicted son, Trig. With the click of a button, Palin transformed the tone of the health care debate from rancorous to poisonous.

The source of Palin's "death panels" smear was a practiced propagandist, former New York Lieutenant Governor Betsy McCaughey. When President Bill Clinton introduced health care reform during his first term, McCaughey falsely claimed in an article published in the New Republic and widely circulated by Republicans, that the plan would force consumers to drop their private plans and buy into the government's program (the article would go on to win a National Magazine Award and then be retracted years later by the New Republic's editors). Now she was back in the spotlight, pushing a rumor that would be voted by the non-partisan fact-checking Web site Politifact.com as "the lie of 2009." McCaughey's latest innuendo was boosted by the cult of political crank Lyndon LaRouche, which mobilized to push the rumor into the mainstream.

In June 2009, one of LaRouche's top lieutenants publicly confronted Ezekiel Emanuel, the National Institute of Health's chief bioethicist and brother of White House chief of staff Rahm Emanuel, accusing him of seeking to reintroduce Hitler's T-4 program to kill the handicapped through health care reform. "President Obama has put in place a reform apparatus reviving the euthanasia of Hitler Germany in 1939, that began the genocide there," LaRouche staffer Anton Chaitkin charged. Soon, LaRouche's followers were on street corners around the country with posters depicting Obama with a Hitler moustache. At a town hall forum on health care reform hosted by Democratic Rep. Barney Frank, a LaRouche follower waved one of the Obama-as-Hitler posters and demanded, "Why do you continue to support a Nazi policy, as Obama has expressly supported this policy?"

Two months later, after Palin whispered the rumor on Facebook, prominent conservatives from former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich to ranking Senate Finance Committee member Charles Grassley parroted her claims before audiences of indignant Tea Partiers. Not to be outdone, Glenn Beck devoted an extended rant on his show to the reality of death panels. Echoing the LaRouche cultists, Beck accused Ezekiel Emanuel of "the devaluing of human life, putting a price on each individual." He thundered, "The death panel is not a firing squad. Rationing is inevitable and they know it!"

The death panel rumor served a variety of functions, all useful to the movement, but not necessarily to the Republican Party. Most importantly, the rumor resonated both with hard-core libertarians who resented the very existence of the federal government and Christian Right activists who viewed the legalization of abortion as a slippery slope to government-sponsored euthanasia. The hysteria it engendered helped repair the rift exposed by the Terri Schiavo charade in 2005, when the evangelical conservative James Dobson publicly clashed with Armey, the libertarian leader, over the right of the government to interfere in a private family matter of life and death.

The slurring of Obama as a sort of sleeper agent crypto-Muslim helped bring the neoconservatives back into the fray. The new neo-con generation was led by Dick Cheney's daughter, Liz, who founded an anti-Obama advocacy group, Keep America Safe, by leveraging donations from pro-Israel sources. Asked by CNN's Larry King about the Birther movement that was challenging Obama's status as an American citizen, Liz Cheney remarked, "One of the reasons you see people so concerned about this is people are uncomfortable with having for the first time ever, I think, a president who seems so reluctant to defend the nation overseas." With the libertarians, Christian Right, and the neo-cons seated around the same table, united in resentment of the alien president, the conservative movement was whole again.

The experiments in "Terror Management Theory" of Sheldon Solomon, professor of psychology at Skidmore College, Jeff Greenberg, professor of psychologist at the Unviersity of Arizona, and Tom Pyszczynski, professor of psychology at the University of Colorado, have demonstrated the connection between fear of death and intensification of conservative attitudes. The findings help explain the effectiveness of the death panel rumor and insinuations by conservative figures that Obama was not truly American and somehow sympathetic to Islamic terrorists. Indeed, these seemingly irrational smears were guided by tactical reasoning, calculated to agitate voters with constant reminders of their own mortality. Whether or not Independents responded, the rhetoric of death kept the Tea Party crowd in a persistent state of panic and rage, ensuring a standing army ready to fan out to rallies and town halls at the first sign of liberal malfeasance.

Obama's first year in office was marked by more than raucous protests; there were several disturbing murders committed by far-right extremists. In April 2009, a 22-year-old neo-Nazi wannabe named Richard Poplawsi mowed down a SWAT team of Pittsburgh cops, killing three. Poplawski's best friend told reporters the young killer "grew angry recently over fears Obama would outlaw guns." Later it was discovered that Poplawski had posted a video clip to a neo-Nazi Web site portraying Fox's Glenn Beck contemplating the existence of concentration camps. (After a characteristically thorough investigation, Beck conceded they were not real.) On another occasion, the killer posted a video promoting Tea Party rallies. A month after the Pittsburgh bloodbath, Scott Roeder, a supporter of the militant anti-abortion group Operation Rescue, shot Dr. George Tiller to death while he prayed at his church in Wichita, Kansas. Tiller was declared fair game by the anti-abortion movement because of his role as Kansas's only late-term abortion provider. During at least 28 episodes of Bill O'Reilly's "O'Reilly Factor," O'Reilly had referred to Tiller as "Tiller the baby killer," a criminal guilty of "Nazi stuff." "I wouldn't want to be [Tiller] if there is a Judgment Day," O'Reilly proclaimed.

In August 2009, a middle-aged professional named George Sodini walked into a health club in suburban Pittsburgh and gunned down three women. The mainstream press explained Sodini's motives away by homing in on passages in his online diaries describing his loneliness, inability to convince women to have sex with him, and descent into chronic masturbation. Nearly every major media outlet omitted or ignored a long deranged entry in which Sodini projected his sexual frustration onto Obama, whom he seemed to view as a symbol of black male virility and predation.

The day after Obama's election victory, Sodini wrote: "Good luck to Obama! He will be successful. The liberal media LOVES him. Amerika has chosen The Black Man. Good! In light of this I got ideas outside of Obama's plans for the economy and such. Here it is: Every black man should get a young white girl … Kinda a reverse indentured servitude thing. Every daddy know when he sends his little girl to college, she be … real good. I saw it. 'Not my little girl', daddy says! (Yeah right!!) Black dudes have thier

In another posting to an anti-Clinton forum in 1994, during the height of the Republicans' Whitewater investigation, Sodini revealed that he had purchased a bumper sticker reading, "Stop Socialism, Impeach Clinton," from a National Review ad. A year later, Sodini ranted on an anti-government militia site, "I am convinced that more drastic action is required to bring the country back to the Constitutional order that it was 200 years ago. I don't think any group of political leaders will achieve this for us." Whether or not Sodini's murder spree was motivated by his political passions, he was pathologically death-driven and fixated on the phantasmagoria of right-wing imagery. In his final diary entry, Sodini proclaimed, "Death lives!"

More than any other media figure of the Obama era, Glenn Beck encouraged the campaign of racial demonization and conspiracy that consumed the Tea Party "Patriots." During a broadcast of "Fox and Friends," Beck opined that Obama "has exposed himself over and over and over again as a guy who has a deep-seated hatred for white people, or the white culture." As evidence, Beck pointed to White House green-jobs czar Van Jones, an African American former community organizer who was eventually forced to resign as a direct result of Beck's crusade. From there, Beck targeted another black Obama adviser, Valerie Jarrett, highlighting her ties to ACORN while upholding her and Jones as evidence of Obama's

"socialist" agenda. In another broadcast, Beck played an audio clip of unidentified African Americans referring to "Obama money" as they collected welfare checks in Detroit. Then he showed footage of members of a Kansas City-based youth group practicing a step show, a traditional African-American group dance apparently unfamiliar enough to Beck and his transfixed audience that he felt at liberty to claim the footage as evidence that "Obama's SS" was being trained across inner-city America.

In September 2009, Beck relentlessly targeted ACORN, the Right's new favorite hobgoblin, admitting that he intended to use the poor people's advocacy group to distract his viewers from the health care debate. "Trust me," Beck said, "Everybody now says they're going to be talking about health care. I don't think so." (His statement was reminiscent of Rush Limbaugh's scandal-mongering remark during the early Clinton administration: "Whitewater is about health care.") Beck promptly cued up a series of hidden camera videos shot by conservative youth activists James O'Keefe and Hannah Giles inside ACORN field offices. In the videos, O'Keefe baited African-American staffers into making statements explaining that Giles, who claimed she was a prostitute, could obtain low-income housing. O'Keefe edited in images of himself clad in an outlandish pimp costume to create the impression that he was dressed that way during the meetings with ACORN; however, Giles later admitted her partner had lied about wearing his costume to further incriminate ACORN. In the end, ACORN was exonerated of all criminal wrongdoing while in a separate incident O'Keefe was arrested and charged with a federal crime after he and several conservative pals disguised themselves as telephone repairmen and attempted to wiretap phone lines in the office of Senator Mary Landrieu of Louisiana. Like Ryan Sorba, O'Keefe and his posse were movement cadres paid and directed by well-funded conservative outfits; O'Keefe had been trained by the Leadership Institute, the right-wing youth group that nurtured leading lights like Jack Abramoff, Karl Rove, Ralph Reed, and Jeff Gannon.

While O'Keefe and his buddies plea-bargained with prosecutors, Beck basked in his formula for success. His show earned the highest ratings at Fox News, topping network franchises like O'Reilly and Sean Hannity. In the process, Beck's opinions became firmly implanted in the nervous systems of Tea Party activists. "Glenn Beck has taught us everything we know," a demonstrator at the 9-12 rally told me. "He's opened our eyes to so much."

But unlike the right-wing radio warhorses who helped usher in Newt Gingrich's Republican counter-revolution of 1994, Beck was not an authentic product of the movement. When Rush Limbaugh first began dominating the AM airwaves, Beck was mired in the world of mid-level commercial radio, delivering corny yarns about lesbians and celebrity trash in hopes of becoming the next Howard Stern. By night, as he has tirelessly recounted, he medicated his anxiety with cocaine and alcohol, destroying his first marriage in the process. "We remember Glenn from the womanizing, the drinking, the drugs. Everybody who knew him at the time saw what a complete mess he was," a shock jock from Tampa, Florida, who called himself Bubba the Love Sponge remarked to me during a broadcast of his nationally syndicated show.

Like Dusty Rhodes, the pseudo-populist demagogue of Elia Kazan's 1957 film, A Face in the Crowd, Beck was a self-destructive drifter who might have been crumpled up with a bottle of Mad Dog 20/20 in an alleyway or been locked away in a prison cell had fame not found him first. Beck was only able to stabilize his life when he made his escape from freedom, marrying a conservative Mormon, converting to her religion, and transmuting his urge to abuse drugs into conservative radio diatribes. When Beck first broke into television on CNN's Headline News Channel, he struggled to articulate a coherent political worldview. If he distinguished himself from other big-time conservative hosts in any way, he did so through strained and often snide attempts at humor, remnants of his failed radio career. Nevertheless, with help from his liberal agent, Matthew Hiltzik, Beck snagged a primetime slot at Fox News in early 2009. Around this same time, Beck began promoting the work of an arcane Mormon conspiracy-peddler named W. Cleon Skousen, whom he described as his political lodestar. Suddenly, Beck had something more to offer than irritable mental gestures.

Thanks to Beck's designation of Skousen's pseudohistorical tract The 5000 Year Leap as "required reading" on the Web site of his 9-12 Project, and his promotion of the book on his show, the previously obscure Skousen became the Hidden Imam of the Tea Party movement. By the summer of 2009, Skousen's Leap was among the top 10 books on Amazon.com and a fixture on literature tables at Tea Party gatherings. It went from selling a puny couple of thousand copies in 2007 to selling over 200,000 copies in 2009. Just why the book generated such an instant appeal is difficult to understand. It is little more than a slapdash of quotes from the Founding Fathers, often taken out of context and deliberately oversimplified, to explain why America is the greatest nation in history. In the process, Skousen claims that church and state separation is un-American, that "coercive taxation" is communist, and that marriage is the underpinning of a free society. Benjamin Franklin, who wrote at length on the merits of "amours" with "old women," and who famously solicited prostitutes and fathered a son of out of wedlock, was the ultimate authority Skousen quoted on the importance of marriage.

Though Skousen claims the Founders as the world's foremost source of eternal wisdom, he buttressed his points with fringe sources like the conspiracist Norman Dodd's screeds about the Illuminati. According to Skousen, Dodd claimed that "powerful influences congregating in the United States" like the Rockefellers and the Rothschilds had forced the United States into World War I. Skousen published Dodd's manifestoes in his obscure journal Freemen's Digest, which he founded for the express purpose of propagating conspiracies.

Skousen's paranoid politics were an outgrowth of his participation in extreme anti-communist groups during the 1950s. He boasted of a close friendship with then-FBI director J. Edgar Hoover and said he provided him with research on communist plots, claims disputed by FBI historians. (During a recent interview, Skousen's son, Paul, told me that contrary to rumors of Hoover's cross-dressing and homosexual dalliances, he would set the top cop up on blind dates with live women.) Skousen was fired from his job as Salt Lake City's police chief for, in the words of the city's conservative Mormon mayor, "conduct[ing] his office as chief of police in exactly the same manner in which the communists operate their government." From there, Skousen sailed off to the far shores of the Right-peddling conspiracy tracts like The Naked Communist, and earning condemnation from his beloved FBI, which accused him in an internal memo of "promoting [his] own anti-communism for obvious financial purposes."

Skousen's vocal support for the far-right John Birch Society's claim that communists controlled President Dwight Eisenhower cost him the support of the corporate backers who had paid for his Red-bashing lecture tours. He went off the radar for several years, returning during the late 1960s to accuse the Jewish Rothschild family of secretly bankrolling everyone from Ho Chi Minh to the civil rights movement. By the late 1970s, even the Church of Latter Day Saints distanced itself from Skousen and his conspiracy theories. His work fell through the margins and might have disappeared entirely had Beck not revived it, turning The 5000 Year Leap into the bible of the Tea Party movement. Journalist Alexander Zaitchik observed in his authoritative profile of Skousen on Salon.com that Skousen's renewed influence through Beck and the Tea Party "suggests that the modern base of the Republican Party is headed to a very strange place."

Besides influencing Beck, Skousen's teachings inspired one of the Tea Party movement's most visible grassroots celebrities, retired Sheriff Richard Mack. I met Mack in February at a far-right rally just outside of Montgomery, Alabama. On a makeshift stage towed into the middle of a rodeo arena by a pickup truck, Mack recalled with reverence his mentorship by Skousen, who he said taught him everything he needed to know about the Constitution. Mack urged his spellbound audience to stockpile ammo and store food. "If you control the food supply," Mack warned, "you control the people. And that's the first step to slavery."

Already a hero to conservatives for successfully suing the Clinton administration over the provision in the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act requiring law enforcement to conduct criminal background checks of gun purchasers, Mack reemerged in the Obama era as the archetypal local lawman who vowed to resist the tyrannical federal government. Along with a few dozen former and active military and law enforcement personnel, Mack helped form a self-styled Tea Party militia called the Oathkeepers. Galvanized by their fear of creeping socialism, the Oathkeepers solemnly swore to refuse tyrannical federal orders such as cooperating with foreign troops and forcing Americans into concentration camps. Because the group's members trained for combat, the vow came with suggestion of armed resistance.

Besides Mack, the Oathkeepers attracted a coterie of militia movement retreads into its ranks. The most well-established figure was Mike Vanderboegh, a longtime militia fanatic who published a booklet in the mid-1990s entitled Strategy and Tactics for a Militia Civil War, calling for sniper attacks on "war criminals, secret policemen, rats." With Obama in office, Vandeboegh churned out anti-government screeds on right-wing blogs with renewed passion and supported his efforts by cashing in the $1,300 in federal disability compensation he received each month.

For all the energy the far right exerted in its campaign to strangle Obama's agenda, it was a Democrat who posed the greatest threat to the passage of health care reform. Representative Bart Stupak of Michigan had been in office since 1993, placing him among the senior leadership of the so-called centrist Blue Dog Democrats. When health care reform was introduced in Congress, Stupak became the leader of an informal caucus of anti-abortion Democrats, making him the de facto swing vote on the House version of the bill. By extension, Stupak was the point man in the campaign to ensure that the bill would not allow federal funding for abortion for low-income women.

But after close consultation with leaders of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Stupak went a step further. He introduced a draconian amendment to block women from paying for abortions from even their own private insurance plans. The amendment, which passed the House but was shut down in the Senate, became a key sticking point in health care negotiations. "He's a big hero now in the pro-life community," former Bush Catholic issues adviser Deal Hudson told me in November 2009. "Thanks to him, this is the first time I can remember the pro-life Democrats having any power."

To the chagrin of the Republicans, Stupak entertained offers of compromise from the Democratic leadership. According to Hudson, the Catholic Bishops were keen to see health care reform pass, but only if the bill contained a clear provision forbidding patients from spending federal money on abortion. Finally, in March, after pressure from House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Obama agreed to sign an executive order forbidding the federal funding of abortion. Stupak had been mollified. Now he and his anti-abortion caucus pledged to deliver the swing votes the Democrats needed to pass the bill. As soon as reports seeped out declaring the imminent passage of health care reform, major right-wing blogs like RedState.org churned out virulent denunciations of Stupak, calling him a traitor and sellout. The blog comment sections filled up with dozens of diatribes referring to Stupak in language previously reserved for Dr. George Tiller: "Bart the Baby-Killer."

On March 20, thousands of Tea Party activists surrounded the Capitol's Longworth Building in expectation of Obama's pep talk to the House Democrats and the health care vote. Democratic Representative John Lewis, a hero of the civil rights movement, and Representative Barney Frank, the first openly gay member of Congress, passed through the crowd on their way inside the Capitol. "Nigger!" a demonstrator barked at Lewis. Another called Frank a "faggot," eliciting laughter and cheers from nearby protesters. Meanwhile, as another African-American Democrat, Representative Emanuel Cleaver, ascended the Capitol steps, a protester who had been screaming at Lewis and Frank spat on his face.

With the demonstration carried on into the night, cries of "Kill the bill!" drifted into calls for violence. "I would gladly stand with any of you men here and take these fascists down," a man in camouflage battle dress uniform proclaimed in front of an amateur videographer, pointing toward the Capitol. "You haven't heard the last of me!"

The next day, Republican members of Congress emerged from the Longworth Building to salute the Tea Partiers. The demonstrators cheered wildly for their proxies on the inside. Finally, after hours of impassioned speeches on the House floor, the bill passed. But the drama was hardly over.

Republican Representative Joe Pitts, an anti-abortion Catholic who co-authored Stupak's original amendment, demanded a motion to bring it back to the floor for a vote, a transparent exercise in grandstanding that was certain to fail. In response, Stupak rushed to the podium with a stinging rebuke to Pitts and the Republicans. "The motion to commit does not support life," Stupak declared. "It is the Democrats who have stood up...." Heckling from the Republican side interrupted his statement. As Stupak looked around the House chamber, Rep. Randy Neugebauer, a right-wing Republican from Texas who openly supported the Birther movement, began shouting at him from the backbench, "Baby killer!" Other Republicans joined in, parroting base insults.

While the Republicans sank their heads in defeat, some more militant devotees of the Tea Party movement called for a right-wing Kristallnacht. "If you wish to send a message that Pelosi and her party cannot fail to hear, break their windows," Vanderboegh of the Oathkeepers wrote on a far-right blog hours after the bill passed. "Break them NOW. Break them and run to break again." Within three days, windows and doors at Democratic Party headquarters in New York, Kansas and Arizona had been shattered.

Meanwhile, at least 10 Democratic members of Congress reported receiving death threats. Images of nooses were faxed to the offices of Stupak and James Clyburn, an African-American congressman from South Carolina. Representative Anthony Weiner, an especially vocal proponent of health care reform, received a menacing letter filled with white powder. The brother of Representative Tom Perriello, another health care supporter, had his home gas line deliberately sabotaged after a local Tea Party organizer posted his address online (he had meant to post the congressman's) and encouraged activists to "drop by" to express their anger about Perriello's recent vote. In Tucson, Arizona, the windows of Democratic Representative Gabrielle Giffords' office were shattered by shots from a pellet gun. And a brick was thrown through the window of Representative Louise Slaughter's office in New York as her voicemail filled with threats of impending sniper attacks.

After the passage of the health care bill, the Tea Party floated into a gray zone between authoritarianism and anarchy. Crusading to restore a holy social order, they promoted disorder. Claiming to protect democracy, they smashed windows of elected representatives. Warning of death panels, they called in death threats. With the atmosphere of violence thickening, Palin took to her Twitter account to issue a battle cry: "Don't Retreat, Instead--RELOAD!" Thus concluded the first phase of the Obama era that was to usher in a peaceable kingdom of bipartisanship.

He and I agreed to work closely on this issue. I have asked INR to get us some research on the security issue which the implementing partners frequently raise Note the comment in the Post about the security situation.

As you know we are moving forward on the broader branding issue and plan to have a team of experts advise us as we move forward.

I will keep you posted.

MOSCOW (RIA Novosti) – Russia is grateful to the United States over the assistance in tackling the wildfires raging across the country, Russian Foreign Ministry said. U.S. President Barack Obama made a phone call to his Russian counterpart Dmitry Medvedev August 13 to express his condolences about the disastrous environmental situation in Central Russia and the readiness to supply firefighting equipment. The United States sent to Russia two planes August 13 with state-of-the-art nonflammable uniform for firefighters, special shoes, helmets and glasses onboard. Additional two aircraft with firefighting equipment are expected to arrive.

RELEASE IN FULL

To: HRC
From: Sandy
Subject: Middle East

Congratulations on the resumption of direct talks. As evidenced by your activity over the past several weeks your involvement in the peace process inevitably has deepened as the need for high-level U.S. intervention has grown. I believe that is a positive result. But the more fundamental issue remains what your role can and should be going forward in order to maximize chances of diplomatic success.

I. State of Play

As the U.S. embarks on the next stage in the Israeli-Palestinian process, it faces a series of tactical and strategic challenges regarding policy, politics and personality.

1. At a policy level, the meager results of indirect talks and difficulties in transitioning to direct talks have underscored the lack of trust between the two sides as well as existing substantive gaps. With direct talks begin in the coming days, one obstacles will have been removed, but several remain. Some or all of these may have been resolved in connection with gaining agreement to direct talks.

    a. How to handle the renewal or non-renewal of Israel's settlement moratorium?
    b. What is the goal of the direct talks and is there a consensus on this matter between the parties? A comprehensive agreement on permanent (CAPS) that covers all the details? A framework agreement on permanent status (FAPS) that outlines the governing parameters, along the lines of the 2000 Clinton parameters? Or, less ambitiously, a short (one or two page) statement of principles?
    c. What role will the U.S. play? Will George or another U.S. official be present in all meetings? Will Netanyahu accept that? Is there an argument for allowing the two sides to deal with one another without any intermediary, at least for a while, so that they do not seek to play to the U.S.?
    d. What will the U.S. do in the event of an impasse or breakdown? Should it present bridging proposals and, if so, when?
    e. How much work should be done, in parallel and simultaneously with the direct talks, between the U.S. and the Palestinians on the one hand and the U.S. and Israel on the other?

    Beyond those questions, I am persuaded the most important factor is and is likely to remain what Netanyahu is prepared to do. You have witnessed first-hand how difficult it can be to deal with the Palestinians and the Arab world more generally; how fragile is Abbas's political position; how indecisive they can be. Still, at bottom, we have a relatively clear sense of their positions on the core issues should we ever reach a moment of truth. That is not the case with Netanyahu who either does not know himself or is not prepared to share and who, until now, has neither felt the urgency to reach a deal nor the discomfort of the status quo.

Assuming Bibi can be convinced of the benefits of a deal along lines acceptable to the Palestinians, this will not occur solely on the basis of his talks with Abbas, whom he likes but does not truly respect and who he fears will not be in a position to deliver. Rather, it will happen only if he feels that (1) it is under the leadership of a U.S. administration he genuinely trusts; (2) he is convinced that the combination of the agreement and U.S. assurances meets his core needs in terms of Israeli security and international recognition of its Jewish character; and (3) he feels that, again with U.S. help, he can sell it to his people and survive -- or even thrive -- politically.

Getting Bibi to accept the core compromises will not be enough, of course. Other basic elements of the strategy must involve reaching out effectively to the Israeli public and ensuring strong, vocal Arab support for a U.S.- sponsored deal without which Abbas cannot say yes and Israelis will lack the incentive to do so. But the point is that a prerequisite for a successful peace effort is for the U.S. to convince the prime minister -- through various forms of overt persuasion and implicit pressure -- to make the necessary compromises. At the end of the day, if Bibi is to make a deal, it will be a deal with the U.S. as much as with the Palestinians.

2. At a political level, the past year has clearly demonstrated the degree to which the U.S. has been hamstrung by its low ratings in Israel and among important segments of the domestic Jewish constituency. This is a critical dimension not for electoral reasons, but because the U.S.'s best chance of influencing Bibi is to build support for a deal in Israel and at home among those who care most. That capacity has been improved to some extent as a result of the successful July visit by Netanyahu and the string of military/security deals between our two countries. But we must be honest: there sill is a long way to go. If anything, the recent Obama/Bibi illustrated a new, potentially perverse dynamic: the U.S. president at this juncture needs the Israeli prime minister to validate his pro-Israeli credentials more than the Israeli prime minister needs the U.S. president to vouch for his pro-peace ones.

3. At the level of personalities, George, with all his skill and perseverance, cannot by himself secure serious concessions from the parties by himself.. In recent discussions, both Israelis and Palestinians described him as someone they respected but to whom they would not make major concessions. This is the curse of the day-to-day negotiator. When they are ready to deal, they will only deal with the players they perceive with authority. It was not different for Dennis during the Clinton Administration. This does not mean that Mitchell does not have a crucial role going forward. Indeed, he can be empowered by your more active involvement.

The president faces a different but no less difficult problem. He is not trusted in Israel and, though the July meeting might have altered the situation somewhat, not trusted by Bibi. Domestically, he faces a reservoir of skepticism on this issue which reflects many factors, including inexcusable prejudice, but which could obstruct his effectiveness both as an interlocutor and as a salesman. Besides, as we learned during WJC's presidency, it would be a mistake for Obama to get too deeply invested in negotiations prior to the end-point; he does not have the time and should not expend the political capital prematurely. To do so, moreover, would automatically be to devalue the role of anyone beneath him, thus making the peace process as a whole excessively dependent on his involvement.

II. Your Role

Under these circumstances, in my view, your deeper involvement is both essential and potentially highly beneficial. It should be a selective involvement; Mitchell still must be the day-to-day negotiator and others also must play a part. In particular, I would not recommend you get overly mired in the details of the direct talks or the set of questions I described above (about their format, goal, U.S. role, etc) other than at critical junctures. Nor would I advise you to get pulled into a Christopher-style shuttle diplomacy which would quickly depreciate your value.

Rather, by injecting yourself strategically at the right time and in the right way, you could fill the gaps identified above. This is because you are uniquely placed to address the need both for a higher-level mediator and for someone who enjoys considerable credibility in Israel and the U.S. (Bibi reportedly told someone recently he was prepared to deal substantively with Obama and with you).

Your role would be twofold

1. To serve as the higher-level interlocutor on matters of final status. To a large degree, Abbas's positions are already known; they will have to be further explored and he will have to be pushed, and you should engage him. But we probably know his zone of possible agreement. Not so with Bibi and, I believe, you are ideally suited to begin a series of in-depth conversations aimed at understanding his key concerns, how they can be met, what he would need from us and others, and how far, at the end of the day, he is prepared to go with the Palestinians if his security and other needs are met. Bibi knows and trusts you; in fact, you are almost certainly the high-level U.S. official he trusts most. If you succeed in taking him into your confidence and work with him over time, you could pave the way for an Israeli-U.S. understanding that would underpin an Israeli-Palestinian agreement. At times, this will require being tough and pushing back against some of his most extreme demands (the militarily questionable request for a very long term Israeli presence in the Jordan Valley being one of them) and proposing more rational alternatives. But the point is that without getting Bibi to trust and level with us, without him feeling both what he has to lose but also what he has to gain, this process is unlikely to go anywhere.

   To repeat, this should not be at Mitchell's expense. It should be a parallel, reinforcing process in which you would deal one-on-one with Abbas and Netanyahu at periodic intervals, for extensive periods of time.

2. To help restore the U.S.'s image and credibility in Israel and among important domestic constituencies. You have the history, background and credentials to do so here and in Israel and thus to overcome some of the suspicion with which Obama must contend. Over time, through a series of visits and public statements, you would seek to make the case for a peace agreement in positive terms, focusing on what benefits it would bring to Israelis rather than on the costs they would incur: secure and recognized borders; stronger security ties to the U.S. and others; an end to the conflict; normal relations with the Arab world; and strengthened international legitimacy.

III. Potential Downsides and Responses

1. Dragging you into the weeds of negotiations. A risk exists that, though repeated meetings with Bibi and Abbas, you will be drawn into detailed discussions over the nature of the territorial compromise, the precise security arrangements, etc. This would be unhelpful both to the process and to you. There is a fine line between discussing the principles that should guide the final outcome and the precise details of that outcome, but it will be important not to cross it. Your role should be to extract from Bibi important understandings and parameters (e.g., security arrangements on the Jordan valley that minimize infringements on Palestinian sovereignty and minimize the duration of any residual Israeli presence) and then have your respective negotiators work out the details

2. Disempowering George. A related danger is to render George powerless by creating the sense that everything can and should be dealt with through you. Besides potentially leading him to step down, this outcome would not serve your interests for the reasons just cited, your effectiveness being a function of your remaining somewhat removed from the day-to-day specifics of the talks. In fact, as I see it, this process could and should end up strengthening George's presently hand by clarifying it. Once you and Bibi will have reached agreement on broad principles, the two of you will provide instructions to your respective negotiators to find solutions that reflect them. In that sense, both George and his counterpart will have a stronger and clearer mandate than currently is the case.

3. Involving you in a failed enterprise. Of all the potential downsides, this is the most significant one and ought not to be dismissed lightly. Failure is a real possibility. Palestinians are in disarray. The Arab world is profoundly divided, with forthcoming successions in Egypt and Saudi Arabia that will weaken two of the states upon which we most rely. And a serious questionmark hovers over Bibi's politics, his head and his heart. As a result, a powerful argument could be made that you would be better off keeping at arms' length from this process, especially given how much else is on your plate. That said, I disagree for the following reasons:

    a. By not getting involved, you risk the worst of two worlds: being associated with a failure (which, by virtue of your position, you inevitably would be) and being criticized for not having been engaged in an effort to avert it.
    b. Over the past year and a half, you have been involved -- traveling to the region; seeking to convince Abbas to enter into talks; commenting on the settlement freeze in Jerusalem -- and you will not be able to escape that kind of involvement in the future. The problem is that your engagement has appeared to be sporadic rather than strategic -- that you've been deployed when it has been deemed necessary to get out of an impasse rather than in order to implement a long term, well thought-out plan. I do not think that has served you well.

c. While one cannot by any means be confident of success, I believe an agreement is possible but that it only has a chance if we can work effectively to bring Bibi into a position where he believes that the costs of a historical compromise are outweighed by its benefits.

d. If we don't try all we can over the next year or year and a half, you will in all likelihood be forced to deal extensively with the Middle East -- albeit not in a peacemaking but in a crisis-managing mode. Without movement on the peace process, Abbas could depart, Fayyad's state-building plan could be gone in smoke, hostilities might break out between Israel, Syria and Hizbollah and the U.S. would have to deal with Iran in an even less hospitable regional climate.

North Korea Takes to Twitter and YouTube By CHOE SANG-HUN The New York Times August 17, 2010

SEOUL, South Korea - North Korea has taken its propaganda war against South Korea and the United States to a new frontier: YouTube and Twitter.

In the last month, North Korea has posted a series of video clips on YouTube brimming with satire and vitriol against leaders in South Korea and the United States.

In one clip, it called Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton a "minister in a skirt" and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates a "war maniac," while depicting the South Korean defense minister, Kim Tae-young, as a "servile dog" that likes to be patted by "its American master."

Such language used to be standard in North Korea's cold-war-era propaganda. Its revival is testimony to the increased chill in relations between the Koreas in recent months.

In the past week, North Korea also began operating a Twitter account under the name uriminzok, or "our nation."

Both the Twitter and YouTube accounts are owned by a user named "uriminzokkiri." The Web site www.uriminzokkiri.com is run by the Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of Korea, a propaganda agency in Pyongyang.

Lee Jong-joo, a spokeswoman for the Unification Ministry in Seoul, said, "It is clear that these accounts carry the same propaganda as the North's official news media, but we have not been able to find out who operates them."

The two Koreas agreed to stop their psychological war after their first summit meeting in 2000. But South Korea resumed propaganda radio broadcasts in May, when it accused the North of torpedoing one of its warships, killing 46 sailors.

North Korea, which denies involvement, has vowed to retaliate. It appears to have found a way with Twitter and YouTube, with their intended audience clearly South Koreans. (North Korea keeps its people isolated from the outside world.)

"YouTube and Twitter gave North Korea a high-tech detour for its propaganda," said Paik Hak-soon, an analyst at Sjong Institute. "But fundamentally, it's not new technology but rather political tension that drives the North to lash out desperately in the face of mounting international pressure."

During the cold war era, South Korea punished people caught listening to North Korean broadcasts. Several years ago, during the brief era of its "sunshine policy" of engaging the North, the South allowed its people access to North Korean Web sites. But today, when a computer user in South Korea clicks on an item on the North Korean Twitter account, a government warning against "illegal content" pops up.

These blocks have triggered criticism here that the Seoul government does not trust its people to form their own opinions about the totalitarian North.

But the government says the North is using the Internet to spread conspiracy theories about who was behind the sinking of the South Korean warship, including one claim that an American submarine did so to foster a militant mood in the South.

The Twitter account, which provides links to the North Korean Web site, had 928 followers as of Monday. But a few YouTube video clips uploaded by the North commanded thousands of views.

In one such clip, North Korea attacked Yu Myung-hwan, the South Korean foreign minister, who recently criticized "pro-North Korean youths" who voted for the opposition in the June local elections, saying, "If they like the North so much, they should go and live under Kim Jong-il."

The clip's narrator calls Mr. Yu a "pro-American flunky" and advised Mr. Yu to earn a living "mopping the floor of the Pentagon."

Another clip claimed that North Korea would prevail in a war with the "American imperialists" because it was armed with nuclear-fusion technology; because of its juche, or ideology of "self-reliance"; and because of a philosophical treatise written by Kim Il-sung, the North's founding president and the father of Kim Jong-il, who died in 1994.

"I don't think this propaganda from the North will have any significant impact among South Koreans," said Yoo Ho-yeol, an expert on North Korea at Korea University here. "People watch this for fun, not to be influenced."

Subject: Pakistan Flood Releif report

Pat as of 8/23 for the Pakistan Flood Relief:

1. Have received $21, 170 in pledge funds from texting all at $10 each so 2,117 pledges
2. Have received $73,358 in credit card donations from 608 donors
3. Have received $ 1,725 in ACH donations from 15 donors
4. Have received $14,025 in mailed in checks from 92 donors
5. Have received $ 3 in cash from one donor

So in total we have received $110,281 in pledges and donations from 2833 donors (assuming all my math is right)

On average this is about $39 per donation/pledge if you excluded the ten dollar pledges/donations the average donation was $124 dollars

As we discussed I will provide a more standardized reporting every Tuesday and Thursday - just let me know if you want anyone else included on the reporting - jim

Subject: talk with Qureshi

I just spoke at length with Qureshi--he had just checked into his hotel. Some of what he said may be useful for Secretary's speech, others are generally instructive:

1- He has a 3.5 minute curtain raiser comment planned about what has happened followed by a five minute "documentary" on the floods that they plan to distribute as CDs.

2-The flood is the biggest since 1929 (almost two decades before Pakistan was born)

3-The Monsoon season will last another 3-4 weeks, and if rains continue things will get a lot worse. He says we are only witnessing the effects of the first flood wave, the second is about to happen, and they are expecting a third wave before the end of the monsoon. The current flood is largely caused by the swelling of Kabul and Indus rivers, the next waves will include the major rivers running from India through Azad Kashmir and Punjab into Sind. The pressure is already building in Indian dams and soon they have to release the water.
Pakistan is talking to India, but there is little India can do about the issue.
Flooding in eastern rivers will engulf Baluchistan and Punja as well, more agricultural lands, creating more refugees and forcing the first wave of refugees to move again.

4-The greatest damage is done in the two areas of the country where the security problem is worst: Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa and Southern Punjab. Devastation is not just by the water but also by the refugee problem (major issue in Punjab and Baluchistan). As a result tents and refugee relief is the most needed follow up to helicopter support. The problem in these areas will impact fight against extremism, but he said that exodus to larger cities, and dryer rural districts is bound to cause a variety of other social and political problems.

5-The Pakistan government was caught by surprise by the magnitude of the problem, especially at local level. Local authorities in may cases were busy evacuating their own families, and then were overwhelmed by the size of the problem. The only functioning effort was by the National Disaster Management Authority (NDMA) that was created as part of 2005 earthquake relief, and is led by General Nadim (working closely with ODRO). But Qureshi says that while NDMA functions well at national level, at local level it lacks capacity.

6-The largest challenge is complete collapse of local government (the level at which implementation is and will have to happen. And this involves not just PPP, but PMLN and MQM and ANP as well. As a result, the flood has created interest in cooperation between all political parties, since local governments of all of them are lacking and face protest.

7-In Islamabad Gilani is in charge, but in effect the army has stepped in to fill the vaccuum for lack of local government. But even the army is not up to the task.

8-Because of collapse of local government and infrastructure, helicopters were the single most important thing, and there the US contribution was singularly important.

9-He said friend and foe in Pakistan praises what US has done. The eprception is that the US was first out of gate to help Pakistan. What has impressed Pakistanis is not just the assistance, but what US officials have said publicly, and the very visible compassion they have shown for Pakistan. He singled out Ambassador Holbrooke's passionate plea for assistance to Pakistan as having made an important impact.

10-Qureshi said he is deeply worried that the international community may not understand that the worst is yet to come, not just floods but what comes after.
He said: Pakistan will have tom revise its budget, its cotton exports are gone and it will ahve to import food it once produced to feed its own. It will have to invest hugely in infrastructure and rural development, He said the "economic future is bleak" and if "we don't act quickly the consequences will be disasterous". Pakistan he said needs immediate relief, but also investment in capacity building and reconstruction.

11-He is considering skipping DC this trip (to be confirmed), and organizing a separate trip there later that would include visit to the Hill and doing the think tank round.

I enjoyed our talk too, but forgot to mention the most important thing of all -- how much I appreciate your bringing me to State and giving me this opportunity. I have learned so much, meant so many smart and capable people, and hope I have contributed in some small way to what you are working so hard to accomplish.

I'll write a formal letter for "the file" when I leave conveying all of these thoughts,, but I wanted to say something in person too.
Unfortunately, I got carried away on sports diplomacy and everything else and . . . .another senior moment!

I'll let you know when I have had a chance to talk to Judith and Ann about the ideas I'm putting together on sports. I do think there is potential to do much more than is being done now -- and more creatively.

Cheryl. What happened this past couple of weeks has been amazing. We've been working with the Haitians and the Hansolls, trying to put everything together for months now. Since your appearance on the scene, things have caught amazing speed and vertigo, and having President Clinton and you chair today's ceremony has been an honour and privilege. We still have to deliver more than promises, but the motivation you've brought into the Haitian and our own teams is just tremendous, so I am extremely optimistic about the outcome and our capacity to do things on time. B6

The Jerusalem city council is set to review the Kings Garden/Gan Hamelech/Bustan plan tomorrow. Recall that the plan received approval by a municipal sub committee in late June. The entire city council must now review and approve the plan because of an administrative appeal filed against it by a Meretz city council member (this appeal process requires that the entire city council review the plan at some point.) Lots of other details here that Jerusalem will be including in a front channel cable. Amanda Pilz, CCed here, drafted.

Bottom line though is that (1) this is on the agenda at the explicit direction of the Mayor and deputy mayor and (2) there is no statutory or other need for this review tomorrow.

Also note that this is not the final step in the process. After full Jerusalem municipal approval the plan must go to Ministry of Interior bodies. So there is a whole lot of theater involved in this.

Lastly, recall that the Gan Hamelech plan involves extensive demolitions and the redevelopment of Bustan, a section of the Silwan which is a stone throw away from the Old City. (When S made her comments on demolition in November 2009 she was referring to Bustan demolitions)

Does Thomas Friedman Have to Talk to "Senior Economic Policy Makers" to Get So Many Things Wrong?

Dean Baker is co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington, DC.

Wednesday, 18 August 2010 04:04

Thomas Friedman begins his piece today by telling readers that: "over the past few weeks I've had a chance to speak with senior economic policy makers in America and Germany." This might lead readers to believe that he is about to share some great insights that would only be possible for someone with special access to these senior economic policy makers.

Readers with this expectation will be seriously disappointed. There is nothing here that is more insightful than what can be found on the Washington Post's editorial pages on an average workday. Friedman rehashes the usual cliches, with the usual lack of thought. In doing so, he gets both the story of the recent past and the present seriously wrong.

Starting with the past, he badly misrepresents the prior business cycle:

"we've just ended more than a decade of debt-fueled growth during which we borrowed money from China to give ourselves a tax cut and more entitlements but did nothing to curtail spending or make long-term investments in new growth engines."

The main problem facing the U.S. economy of the last decade was a lack of demand. This was in large part due to the fact that China lent to us. China's lending was its policy of propping up the value of the dollar in order to maintain its export market in the United States. (At the start of the decade, the Clinton administration had also tried to promote an over-valued dollar.) The over-valued U.S. dollar made imports from China and other countries very cheap in the United States and made our exports expensive in other countries. This led to a large and growing trade deficit over most of the business cycle. The trade deficit replaced domestic demand, preventing the economy from approaching normal levels of employment (even with the boost from the housing bubble) until just before the crash.

There is no reason whatsoever to believe that China's decision to prop up the dollar was in any way affected by the Bush tax cuts. In other words, neither the Bush tax cuts nor the growth in entitlements had anything to do with our borrowing from China. The issue was China's decision to lend and thereby prop up the dollar. Given the weakness of demand through most of the decade, these expenses could have been easily filled by domestic production without borrowing from abroad.

Friedman does no better when he shifts the discussion from the past to the present. He refers to businesses' reluctance to hire as the result of "unusual uncertainty," a phrase attributed to Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke. Of course there is no reluctance to hire, there is simply a lack of demand for labor. A reluctance to hire would be reflected in an increasing number of hours per worker, as employers sought to meet their demand for labor by working the existing workforce more hours.

This is not happening. There is a modest uptick in hours from the low point of the downturn, but the increase in hours per worker is certainly no more rapid than in other recessions and the average workweek is still far shorter in just about every sector than it was before the downturn.

Later he tells readers:

"America's solvency inflection point is coinciding with a technological one. Thanks to Internet diffusion, the rise of cloud computing, social networking and the shift from laptops and desktops to hand-held iPads and iPhones, technology is destroying older, less skilled jobs that paid a decent wage at a faster pace than ever while spinning off more new skilled jobs that pay a decent wage but require more education than ever."

This is a great story -- social networking is soaring, IPads are everywhere -- does Friedman have any evidence whatsoever that this development has increased the demand for educated workers and reduced the demand for less educated workers? If so, this would be the place in his column to present the evidence. Otherwise, readers might think that the 4.7 percent unemployment rate for college grads (nearly triple the pre-recession level), coupled with a decline in their real wages over the decade, implies a reduced demand for the labor of highly educated workers as well as less educated workers.

Friedman's proposed fix also seems a bit wide of the mark. He insists:

"There is only one way to deal with this challenge: more innovation to stimulate new industries and jobs that can pay workers $40 an hour, coupled with a huge initiative to train more Americans to win these jobs over their global competitors. There is no other way."

We better hope there is another way. A wage of $40 an hour would put a worker well over the 90th percentile on the wage distribution. Even if we double the number of jobs in this pay range -- an incredible accomplishment -- what happens to the other 80 percent of the workforce?

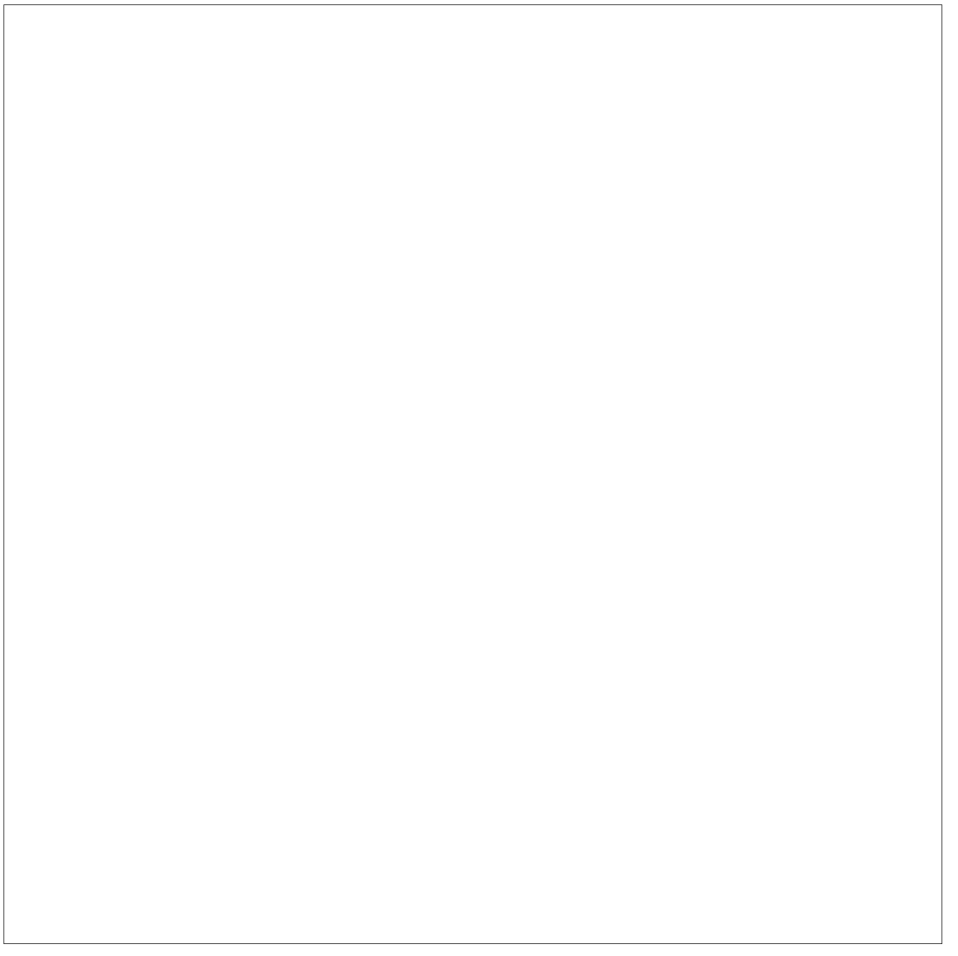
Friedman then warns us of the challenge from Europe by getting Germany's past and present wrong:

"Keeping up with Germany won't be easy. A decade ago Germany was the 'sick man of Europe.' No more. The Germans pulled together. Labor gave up wage hikes and allowed businesses to improve competitiveness and worker flexibility, while the government subsidized firms to keep skilled workers on the job in the downturn."

Germany clearly has done some changes that benefited its economy, like work sharing, and some that haven't, but its past as the "sick man of Europe" is an invention of Friedman or his highly placed sources. Germany always ran a trade surplus. That is the most basic measure of a country's competitiveness: foreigners are buying its goods. Germany's unemployment rate in 2000 averaged 7.5 percent, not hugely different than its current 7.0 percent rate.

The story here is that Friedman seems to have completely missed the basics of the current economic crisis in spite of his weeks of conversing with senior economic policy makers. The current crisis is due to a lack of demand pure and simple. If we generate demand either through more expansionary Fed monetary policy, greater fiscal stimulus, or increased exports due to a falling dollar, there is no reason to believe that the economy will not return to high levels of employment. Certainly Friedman has presented no evidence that increased demand will not generate increased employment as it always has.

The longer term debt problem is overwhelmingly a health care story. Apparently Mr. Friedman's sources don't have access to documents like the Medicare trustees report, which imply that U.S. health care costs will be controlled and there will be no serious long-term deficit problem. This may prove wrong, but it seems that it would have at least been worth noting in his column. Of course, if we have not fixed our health care system, we can always achieve huge saving by relying on the more efficient health care systems in other countries.



If Friedman's intention was to scare us, he succeeded. After all, if senior economic policy makers in the U.S. and Germany are as badly misinformed as Friedman implies, then we can expect some very bad times ahead.

GHAZI AIR BASE (AP) – The United States will increase its aid to flood-ravaged Pakistan to $150 million, U.S. Sen. John Kerry said, stressing that Washington did not want Islamist extremism to increase on the back of the crisis. The United States has deployed army helicopters to hard hit areas as part of a package worth $90 million. U.S. Sen. John Kerry, who is visiting Pakistan to see the flood damage, said that would increase to $150 million. The figure is expected to be announced at a U.N. general assembly meeting in New York August 19. He was speaking after meeting U.S. military personnel taking part in helicopter relief missions.

The military and the mullahs

William Dalrymple
Published 23 August 2010
The Pakistani state has a long history of nurturing jihadis as a means of dominating Afghanistan and undermining India. It is proving a fatal alliance.

It may have been a nightmarish year for Pakistan but it has been a pretty good one for the country's inscrutable chief of army staff, the most powerful man in the Land of the Pure, General Ashfaq Parvez Kayani.
For a start, the army's response to the floods has compared well to the usual corrupt incompetence of Pakistan's civilian politicians, guided by their chateau-hopping president, Asif Ali Zardari (while minister for investment, he was nicknamed "Mr 10 Per Cent"; he has now been upgraded to "Mr 110 Per Cent"). This has led to discussion in army circles about whether it is time to drop the civilian fig leaf and return the country to the loving embrace of its military. So serious is this threat, that one of the country's most senior and well-connected journalists, Najam Sethi, editor-in-chief of the Friday Times, went on the record this month to warn that elements in the army were plotting yet another coup. "I know this is definitely being discussed," he said.
Then there was the news that Kayani was going to be allowed to keep his job for a second term: "an extraordinary situation requires an extraordinary decision to overcome it", explained a brigadier, writing in the Nation newspaper. Kayani, a former head of Pakistan's notorious intelligence agency, the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), can now continue to run the army, and by default Pakistan's foreign policy, until November 2013.
But Kayani's biggest triumph this year, arguably the greatest of his career, was his visit to Kabul in July as the honoured guest of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai. The visit marked an important thawing in Pak-Afghan relations, which have been glacial ever since Karzai came to power in 2001. It also coincided with the sacking of Amrullah Saleh, Karzai's pro-Indian and rabidly anti-ISI former security chief. Saleh is a tough Tajik who rose to prominence as a mujahedin protégé of Ahmed Shah Massoud, the Indian-backed "Lion of Panjshir". The Taliban, and their sponsors in the ISI, had regarded Saleh as their fiercest opponent, something Saleh was enormously proud of.
When I had dinner with him in Kabul in May, he spoke at length of his frustration with the ineffectiveness of Karzai's government in taking the fight to the Taliban, and the extent to which the ISI was managing to aid, arm and train its puppet insurgents in North Waziristan and Balochistan. Saleh's sacking gave notice of an important change of direction by Karzai. As Bruce Riedel, Barack Obama's Af-Pak adviser, said when the news broke, "it means that Karzai is already planning for a post-American Afghanistan".
It seems that Kayani and Karzai are discussing some sort of accommodation between the Afghan government and ISI-sponsored elements in the Taliban, maybe those of Sirajuddin Haqqani, which could give over much of the Pashtun south to pro-Pakistan Taliban, but preserve Karzai in power in Kabul after the US withdrawal. The expulsion of India, Pakistan's great regional rival, from Afghanistan, or at least the closing of its four regional consulates, would be a top priority for the ISI in return for any deal that kept Karzai in power.
With the US toppling of the Taliban after the 11 September 2001 attacks, Pakistan's influence disappeared abruptly from Afghanistan and India quickly filled the vacuum. To the ISI's horror, in the early years of this decade, India provided reconstruction assistance and training worth roughly £835m in total. It also built roads, sanitation projects, the new Afghan parliament and free medical facilities across the country. It even offered to help train the Afghan army. Nato refused. As General

Stanley McChrystal put it in a report last year, "while Indian activities largely benefit the Afghan people, increasing Indian influence in Afghanistan is likely to exacerbate regional tensions and encourage Pakistani countermeasures".
McChrystal was right. The Pakistanis have always been paranoid about the small Indian presence in Afghanistan. "We have strong evidence [that India is] using Afghanistan against Pakistan's interests to destabilise Pakistan," a foreign ministry spokesman claimed in March. Pakistan's military establishment, terrified of the economic superpower emerging to the south, believes it would be suicide to accept an Indian presence in what it regards as its Afghan backyard - a potential point of retreat for the army in the event of an Indian invasion, something Pakistani analysts refer to as vital "strategic depth".
According to Indian diplomatic sources, there are still fewer than 3,600 Indians in Afghanistan; there are only ten Indian diplomatic officers, as opposed to nearly 150 in the UK embassy. Yet the horror of being encircled has led the ISI to risk Pakistan's relationship with its main strategic ally, the US, in order to keep the Taliban in play and its leadership under ISI patronage in Quetta - a policy Kayani developed while head of the ISI. Karzai's new deal with the Pakistanis, and his clear intention to try to reach some accommodation with their proxies among the Taliban, therefore represents a major strategic victory for Kayani and Pakistan's military, as well as a grave diplomatic defeat for India.
Pakistan's support for the Taliban today is only the most recent chapter of an old story of complicity between jihadi movements and the Pakistani state. Since the days of the anti-Soviet mujahedin, Pakistan's army saw violent Islamic groups as an ingenious and cost-effective means of both dominating Afghanistan (which they finally achieved with the retreat of the Soviets in 1987) and bogging down the Hindu-dominated Indian army in Kashmir (which they managed with great effect from 1990 onwards).
The former ISI director and Dick Dastardly lookalike Hamid Gul, who was largely responsible for developing the strategy, once said to me: "If the jihadis go out and contain India, tying down one million men of their army on their own soil, for a legitimate cause, why should we not support them?" Next to Gul in his Islamabad living room lay a piece of the Berlin Wall presented to him by the city's people for "delivering the first blow" to the Soviet empire through his use of jihadis in the 1980s. The WikiLeaks documents suggest he is still busy liaising with jihadis in his "retirement".
The Pakistani military top brass were long convinced that they could control the militants they have nurtured. In a taped conversation between President Pervez Musharraf and Muhammad Aziz Khan, his chief of general staff, that India released in 1999, Aziz said the army had the jihadis by their "tooti" (balls). Yet the Islamists have increasingly followed their own agendas, sending suicide bombers out against not just Pakistan's religious minorities and political leaders, but even the ISI headquarters. Nonetheless, many in the army still believe the jihadis are a more practical defence against Indian hegemony than nuclear weapons. For them, supporting Islamist groups is not an ideological or religious whim, so much as a practical and patriotic imperative - a vital survival strategy for a Pakistani state.
The army and ISI continued this duplicitous and risky policy after 11 September 2001 despite Musharraf's public promises to the contrary. The speed with which the US lost interest in Afghanistan after its invasion and embarked on plans to invade Iraq convinced the Pakistani army that the Washington had no long-term commitment to Karzai's regime. This led to the generals keeping the Taliban in reserve, to be used to reinstal a pro-Pakistani regime in Kabul once the American gaze had turned elsewhere.
So it was that the ISI gave refuge to the leadership of the Taliban after it fled from Afghanistan in 2001. Mullah Mohammed Omar was kept in an ISI safehouse in Quetta; his militia was lodged in the sprawling suburb of Pashtunabad. There, Mullah Abdul Ghani Baradar presided over the Taliban military committee and war chest. Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, the leader of Hizb-e-Islami, was lured back from exile in Iran and allowed to operate freely outside Peshawar, while Jalaluddin Haqqani, one of the most violent Taliban commanders, was given sanctuary in North Waziristan. Other groups were despatched to safehouses in Balochistan.
By 2004, the US had filmed Pakistani army trucks delivering Taliban fighters at the Afghan border and recovering them a few days later; wireless monitoring at the US base at Bagram picked up Taliban commanders arranging with Pakistani army officers at the border for safe passage as they came in and out of Afghanistan. Western intelligence agencies concluded that the ISI was running a full training programme for the Afghan Taliban, turning a blind eye as they raised funds in the Gulf and allowing them to import materiel, mainly via Dubai. By 2005 the Taliban, with covert Pakistani support, were launching a full-scale assault on Nato troops in Afghanistan and being given covering fire as they returned to their bases in Pakistan.
At the same time, Taliban attacks on Indian interests in Afghanistan intensified, beginning the process of turning the Afghan conflict, like that in Kashmir, into what it is today: an Indo-Pak proxy war. The Indian embassy in Kabul was twice bombed - in July 2008 and October 2009 - as were two city-centre hotels thought to have been used by the Research and Analysis Wing (Raw), the Indian intelligence agency. Seven Indian civilians and two Indian military officers died in the blasts.
The degree to which the ISI has been controlling the Afghan Taliban has only just become clear, and not just in the documents published by WikiLeaks. A report by Matt Waldman of the Carr Centre for Human Rights at Harvard, based on interviews with ten former senior Taliban commanders, closely documents how the ISI "orchestrates, sustains and strongly influences" the Taliban and shows how the ISI is even represented on the Taliban's supreme leadership council, the Quetta Shura.
Meanwhile, in the Punjab, Hafiz Mohammad Saeed, founder of Lashkar-e-Toiba, and the man believed to have been behind the 2008 Bombay attacks, has been allowed to continue operating from Muridke, near Lahore. "The powerful western world is terrorising Muslims," he told a conference in Islamabad this year. "We are being invaded, manipulated and looted. We must fight the evil trio of America, Israel and India. Suicide missions are in accordance with Islam. In fact, a suicide attack is the best form of jihad."

At the same time as pursuing its policy of selectively using jihadis, Pakistan has appeased the US by giving generous assistance to the CIA in arresting foreign Arab al-Qaeda personnel. A major assault was also launched against both the militants who took over the Lal Masjid and the ultra-radical Pakistan Taliban who took over the Swat Valley and announced their intention of turning the country into an Islamic Emirate. In the course of these operations and others in the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, more than 1,500 Pakistani soldiers and policemen were killed; another 250,000 people were made homeless in the Pak army assault on Bajaur. The ISI has even been prepared to arrest any members of the Afghan Taliban who didn't follow orders. Hence the seizure in Karachi, in February, of the Taliban second-in-command, Mullah Abdul Ghani Baradar, along with about a dozen other senior Taliban whom the ISI regarded as infringing on their hospitality by opening talks with the Karzai administration via the Saudis, without ISI clearance.

Yet, even though the Pakistani army has conducted major offensives in six of the tribal areas, the seventh, North Waziristan, has been left alone, as it is home to the ISI's favourite proxies: Haqqani and Hekmatyar. Similarly, Pakistan's foot-dragging response to the 2008 attacks on Bombay, and the lack of response to the attacks on minority faith groups in Pakistan over the past few months, show that the Janus-faced policy remains in place. This summer, the chief minister of the Punjab, Shahbaz Sharif, was quoted heatedly denying that there were any militant groups working in the Pakistani Punjab, or that the Punjabi Taliban even existed. There are still, in the eyes of many in the Pakistani establishment, good Taliban and bad Taliban, useful militants and expendable ones.

In their eyes, the ongoing defeat of Nato in Afghanistan, with US and British troops suffering record casualties last month, is a vindication of its long-term strategy. Islamabad has succeeded in regaining influence in Afghanistan and Delhi has been checked. But India will not take this lying down. Already the Indian press has reported attempts to resuscitate the Northern Alliance as a contingency against the Taliban's takeover of the south, and here India is working in conjuction with Russia, Iran and the central Asian "stans". The Indian national security adviser, Shivshankar Menon, was despatched to Afghanistan in March, and the foreign minister, S M Krishna, has visited Tehran. Post-American Afghanistan is looking increasingly likely to be divided between the Tajik, Uzbek and Hazara north and the Pashtun south, either formally, with a partition, or more likely, to slip into inter-ethnic civil war, with India supporting and arming the north and Pakistan the south.

As diplomacy gathers pace, the Afghan Taliban, who already control over 70 per cent of the country. continue to increase their power. The most worrying development has been the spread of Taliban units to the previously peaceful north, where they have taken over pockets of Pathan settlement around Kunduz and Badakhshan. The death of the British aid worker Karen Woo on 5 August was a direct result.

In Pakistan, too, jihadi activity is growing. Last year there were 87 suicide attacks across the country, killing roughly 3,000 people and the ISI this week stated that, for the first time in the nation's history, it regarded home-grown Islamic militants to be a bigger threat to the integrity of the nation than India. Yet the army continues to obsess about India. In a recent speech, Kayani emphasised that although the army knows the dangers of militancy, it was against Indian attacks that he was principally focused. At a time when Pakistan's economy is in crisis, electricity supply increasingly erratic and the educational system in complete breakdown, Kayani has secured a huge increase in the country's defence budget.

It is not a pretty picture: growing violence everywhere, increasing Indo-Pak tensions and a defeat for western interests in the region. Worst of all, because the Pakistani army regards this as a major triumph, it is unlikely to change its policy any time soon.

Indian PM shows solidarity with Pakistan against floods

ISLAMABAD, Aug. 19 (Xinhua) -- Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called his Pakistani counterpart Syed Yusuf Raza Gilani over phone Thursday to convey the condolences and commensurations of his government and the people of India on the loss of precious lives and damage to the properties and infrastructure caused by floods in Pakistan.

The Indian prime minister said that the member States in the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation should come together to help Pakistan in every way possible at this critical juncture, according to the Pakistani PM office.

Gilani thanked his Indian counterpart for his kind gesture of calling him to express his sympathies and solidarity with Pakistan in its hour of trial.

He briefed the Indian prime minister over the huge damage caused by this unprecedented natural calamity in all the provinces of the country, which, according to UN estimates, was far bigger than the effects of earthquakes and tsunami which hit Pakistan in 2005 and Haiti last year respectively.

Gilani also availed the opportunity to reiterate Pakistan's keen desire to have friendly, cooperative and good neighborly relations with India.

He hoped that in accordance with the agreement reached in Thimphu in Bhutan in April, the bilateral dialogue between the two countries would progress a meaningful, substantive and result- oriented way by addressing all the issues of concern to both countries including Kashmir dispute.

Subject: (Reuters) U.S. Senate panel approves new arms treaty with Russia

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A U.S. Senate panel approved a new strategic nuclear arms control treaty with Russia on September 16, advancing one of President Barack Obama's main foreign policy priorities to an uncertain future in the full Senate. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 14-4 to approve the new START treaty. The full Senate must consent to the agreement before it can go into effect, but with Congress in the hottest part of the political season before mid-term congressional elections, it is unclear when the treaty will get a vote on the Senate floor. The agreement signed by Obama and Russian President Dmitry Medvedev in April commits former Cold War foes Washington and Moscow to reducing deployed nuclear warheads by about 30 percent.

It picked up some Republican support in the foreign relations committee from Senators Bob Corker and Johnny Isakson. They voted aye along with Richard Lugar, previously the only Senate Republican who had publicly supported the treaty. But since 67 votes are needed to meet the two-thirds minimum required for treaties to pass the full Senate, at least eight Republicans will have to vote for it. Most Republicans have remained uncommitted for months, leaving the treaty's fate in limbo. The weak Republican support to date and the fact the Senate has a lot of business to take care of before the congressional November 2 elections, makes the new START treaty a likely candidate for the "lame duck" session to follow.

Obama wants the new START ratified this year as part of his "reset" of relations with Russia and a step toward his goal of a world without nuclear weapons. Russia must also ratify the treaty, but is waiting to see what the United States will do. The treaty is broadly supported as an important step forward in arms control by former senior security officials from both Republican and Democratic administrations. But some Republican senators say they worry it may limit U.S. missile defenses, and some want Obama to promise to spend more money modernizing the nuclear weapons that remain.

Translated from Ma'ariv

MITCHELL LIKELY TO PAY THE PRICE

Ma'ariv (11/1/2010, p. 6) by Eli Bardenstein -- The US administration intends to replace its special envoy to the Middle East, George Mitchell, said sources in Washington. A number of additional top officials are expected to be replaced at the same opportunity.

The reasons for Mitchell's replacement are the failure he and his team have had at renewing the talks between Israel and the Palestinians, the Administration's desire to bring new blood into the efforts, and pressures to resume the peace process in the region.

One of the names that has already begun to circulate as a potential successor is the former US ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk. Another possible course of action suggested by the blog "Politico" is to divide Mitchell's job into two: Indyk will deal with the Palestinians, while Obama's senior aide, Dennis Ross, will deal with the Israelis.

Mitchell's spokesman, Jonathan Prince, has already left his post under unclear circumstances and has turned to the world of private business. The State Department denied allegations that Prince left because of criticism that he had aired about Ross maintaining positions that were closer to the Israeli positions than to those of the White House.

Another top official in Mitchell's team, Mara Rudman, was supposed to have left her post as the director of Mitchell's staff for a senior position in the State Department, but decided to remain after she was not given the job.

Reports have repeatedly been received in Jerusalem about mounting tension between Mitchell and his team, on the one hand, and Dennis Ross, who works directly for the White House, on the other. The two parties were said to be divided over the way in which it would be possible to persuade Netanyahu to renew the direct talks. Ross, who served in the past in Mitchell's current capacity and headed an Israeli research center—the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute—is believed to have been opposed to the intense pressure that the US administration applied on Israel, arguing that that pressure would not yield the desired results. Ross believed that the administration would be better served by "working with the Israelis and understanding them better," said one source in Jerusalem. An alternate position was maintained by Mitchell and Rudman, who believed that it would be advisable to pressure Netanyahu. It now appears that Ross's approach has prevailed, and that the administration is going to replace the people who guided the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

As Ma'ariv reported, Netanyahu is scheduled to fly to New Orleans next week to attend the general assembly of the Jewish communities, where he will meet Vice President Joe Biden. From there, Netanyahu will make a short visit to New York, where he will meet other Jewish leaders and will give interviews to the American media.

Netanyahu is not going to meet President Obama this time, despite intense efforts that were made by his office to arrange such a meeting. The reason the two men are not going to meet is that President Obama is scheduled to leave for long trip to India, Indonesia and South Korea on the day that Netanyahu arrives. One observer in Washington said: "Obama ran as far away from Bibi as possible in order to avoid a meeting with him. If he could, Obama would take a space ship to Mars."

Netanyahu decided to defy protocol and to go to the United States in any event, Obama's absence notwithstanding .

Can the Dude Abide?

By MAUREEN DOWD

WASHINGTON

Barack Obama became president by brilliantly telling his own story. To stay president, he will need to show he can understand our story.

At first it was exciting that Obama was the sort of brainy, cultivated Democrat who would be at home in a "West Wing" episode.

But now he acts like he really thinks he's on "West Wing," gliding through an imaginary, amber-lit set where his righteous self-regard is bound to be rewarded by the end of the hour.

Hey, dude, you're a politician. Act like one.

As the head of the Democratic Party, the president should have supported the Democratic candidate for governor in Rhode Island, the one the Democratic Governors Association had already lavished more than $1 million in TV ads on. If Obama was going to refuse to endorse Frank Caprio out of respect for Lincoln Chafee, the former Republican who endorsed him for president and is now running as an independent, the president should have at least stayed out of Providence.

Reductio ad absurdum: After two years of taking his base for granted, the former Pied Piper of America's youth had to spar with Jon Stewart to try to get the attention of young people who once idolized him.

Obama still has the killer smile, but he's more often sniffy than funny. When Stewart called White House legislation "timid," Obama got defensive and offered a less-than-thrilling new mantra: "Yes, we can but ..."

"We have done things that people don't even know about," said Obama, who left his Great Communicator mantle back in Grant Park on election night.

In 2008, the message was him. The promise was him. And that's why 2010 is a referendum on him.

With his coalition and governing majority shattering around him, President Obama will have to summon political skills — starting Wednesday — that he has not yet shown he has.

His arrogance led him to assume: If I build it, they will understand. He can't get the gratitude he feels he deserves for his achievements if no one knows what he achieved and why those achievements are so vital.

Once it seemed impressive that he was so comfortable in his own skin. Now that comfort comes across as an unwillingness to be wrong.

We want the best people to govern us, but many voters are so turned off by Obama's superior air that they're rushing into the arms of disturbingly inferior pols.

Obama admitted to The Times's Peter Baker: "There is probably a perverse pride in my administration — and I take responsibility for this; this was blowing from the top — that we were going to do the right thing, even if short term it was unpopular."

But who defines what's "right"?

With the exception of Obama, most Americans seemed to agree that the "right" thing to do until the economy recovered was to focus on jobs instead of getting the Congress mired for months in making over health insurance and energy policy. And the "right" thing to do was to come down harder on the big banks for spending on bonuses instead of lending to small businesses that don't get bailouts.

Many of us thought the "right" thing to do was to ratify the civil rights of gay Americans in marriage and the military. (A new Pentagon study shows that most U.S. troops and their families don't care if gays are allowed to serve openly.)

In an interview with progressive bloggers, the president was asked why he was lagging behind Republicans like Ted Olson on gay marriage.

Noting that he has a lot of friends and staffers in committed gay relationships, Obama conceded only that his attitude was evolving. "I think it's pretty clear where the trend lines are going," the president said.

Trend lines? Really inspiring, dude.

One top aide told me that the president — who perversely tried to marginalize a once-captivated press corps — was beginning to realize that he had not used his charm as effectively as he could have.

His inner circle believed too much in the power of the Aura and in protecting the Brand. They didn't think they needed to sell anything or fight back when the crazies started sliming them. They didn't care that the average citizen needed an M.B.A. to understand the financial plan and a Ph.D. to fathom what the health care plan would mean.

Because Obama stayed above it all on health care and delegated to Max Baucus, he missed the moment in August of 2009 when Sarah Palin and the Tea Party got oxygen with their loopy rants on death panels. It never occurred to the Icon that such wildness and gullibility would trump lofty rationality.

As the president tries to ride the Tea Party tiger, let's hope for this change: that he puts some audacity in his audacity.

To Secretary Clinton: I'm very grateful for your kind reception yesterday. [redacted]

My hope is that progress can now be made in the Middle East, Korea, Sudan, and Cuba, and we are eager to help if you call on us. For instance, we have an enormous group of religious leaders with whom we have been working, which includes prominent Mainline Protestants, Catholics, Evangelicals, African-Americans and Hispanics from across the theological and political spectrum. They can issue public statements, OpEds, etc. to support your efforts with the Israelis and Palestinians. Just have one of your staff members let me know at any time. Also, The Elders are eager for our efforts to be constructive. Our prayers and hopes are with you. Jimmy

Obama was too cautious in fearful times

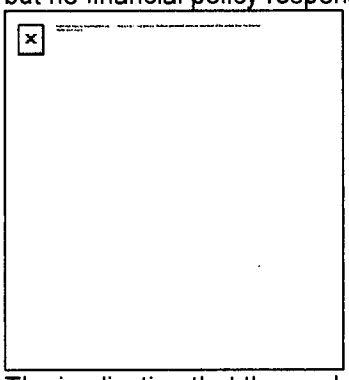
By Martin Wolf
Published: August 31 2010 22:48 | Last updated: August 31 2010 22:48

Suppose that the US presidential election of 1932 had, in fact, taken place in 1930, at an early stage in the Great Depression. Suppose, too, that Franklin Delano Roosevelt had won then, though not by the landslide of 1932. How different subsequent events might have been. The president might have watched helplessly as output and employment collapsed. The decades of Democratic dominance might not have happened.

On such chances the wheel of history turns. But this time was different: the crisis brought Barack Obama to power close to the beginning of the economic collapse. I (among others) then argued that policy needed to be hugely aggressive. Alas, it was not. I noted on February 4 2009, at the beginning of the new presidency: "Instead of an overwhelming fiscal stimulus, what is emerging is too small, too wasteful and too ill-focused." A week later, I asked: "Has Barack Obama's presidency already failed? In normal times, this would be a ludicrous question. But these are not normal times. They are times of great danger. Today, the new US administration can disown responsibility for its inheritance; tomorrow, it will own it. Today, it can offer solutions; tomorrow it will have become the problem. Today, it is in control of events; tomorrow, events will take control of it. Doing too little is now far riskier than doing too much." This was right.



The direction of policy was not wrong: policymakers – though not all economists – had learnt a great deal from the 1930s. Sensible people knew that aggressive monetary and fiscal expansion was needed, together with reconstruction of the financial sector.

But, as Larry Summers, Mr Obama's chief economic adviser, had said: "When markets overshoot, policymakers must overshoot too". Unfortunately, the administration failed to follow his excellent advice. This has allowed opponents to claim that policy has been ineffective when it has merely been inadequate.

In consequence, the administration has lost credibility with the public and the chances of a renewed fiscal expansion have disappeared. With the Federal Reserve cautious, too, the likelihood of a lengthy period of weak growth and heavy joblessness is high. So, too, are the chances of domestic and global political friction.

True, the idea that the policies adopted in the last few months of the Bush administration and the first months of this one were far better than nothing is weirdly controversial in the US. A recent paper by Alan Blinder, former vice-chairman of the Fed, and Mark Zandi of Moody's argues that such critics are wrong. They use a standard macro-economic model to assess what would have happened without any intervention, without the financial interventions (including monetary policy) and without the fiscal action. They conclude that the peak to trough decline in gross domestic product would have been close to 12 per cent with no policy response, compared to an actual decline of just 4 per cent (see chart). Similarly, the unemployment rate would have peaked at 16.5 per cent, instead of the actual 10 per cent. The bigger collapse would also have meant a fiscal deficit of $2,600bn in fiscal year 2011. The outcome is also disastrous with the modest fiscal response but no financial policy response. It is a little better the other way round.

The implication that the modest stimulus package of February 2009 – a mere 5.7 per cent of 2009 GDP, spread over several years – made a positive contribution is supported by the analysis of the Congressional Budget Office: it argues that in 2010, US GDP will be between 1.5 per cent and 4.1 per cent higher and the unemployment rate between 0.7 and 1.8 percentage points lower, as a result of the package.

Panglossians who believe the private economy is always in equilibrium, unless governments intervene, disagree. I wish there were some way to run this experiment without hurting hundreds of millions of people. But I find the idea that allowing the collapse of much of the financial system, avoiding unconventional monetary policy and struggling to close the fiscal deficit would have been consistent with a more rapid and sustained recovery quite bizarre.

A fascinating perspective does come, however, from comparisons with what happened in other advanced countries. The recession in US output (and so demand) has been relatively small, but the decline in employment has been exceptionally large, as a result of an extraordinary surge in US productivity (see charts). This contrast between what would happen to output and what would happen to employment was missed in the initial Congressional Budget Office analysis of the stimulus.

Since the US was the epicentre of the financial crisis, the relatively small decline in output is remarkable. Moreover, since fiscal and monetary stimuli bear directly on demand and output, not jobs, this is a policy success. At the same time, the enthusiasm with which US managers laid off workers is also extraordinary. No doubt, some of this is due to the collapse in construction. But some of it must be due to the ease with which US companies can lay off workers and the incentives for managers to maintain profits in a downturn at the expense of jobs.

Debate is emerging on how much of the surge in unemployment is structural. My answer, from European experience, is that one way to ensure it becomes structural is to let it linger. In the short run, the simplest way to prevent that from happening is to expand demand and so output. Since there is huge slack in the labour market, not the slightest threat of inflation – far more a risk of deflation – and no constraint from bond or foreign exchange markets on further monetary and fiscal stimulus, these are the policies that have to be pursued. Yet, alas, the Fed seems to have decided to fall asleep and the administration has lost the initiative.

So what is going to happen? I assume that, after the midterm elections, resurgent Republicans will offer new tax cuts and ignore the fiscal deficits. They will pretend that this has nothing to do with any reviled stimulus, though it is much the same thing – increasing fiscal deficits, thereby offsetting private frugality. That would put the administration on the spot. It would have to choose between vetoing the tax cuts and accepting them, so allowing the Republicans to get the credit for their "yacht and mansion-led" recovery. Any recovery is better than none. But it could have been much better than this. Those who were cautious when they should have been bold will pay a big price.

Hi Hillary,

I hope you are enjoying your travels. I'm trying to keep the Go, Fight, Win spirit, but I must confess, it's a bit hard.

I promise I will do this rarely, if at all, in the future, but I am once again sending my column. This time I am doing so because it references you and also because it created some buzz related to the primaries.

Looking forward to seeing you in December.

Neera Tanden: How Obama Can Win the Battle Over the Economy

What Will It Take For the Left to Rally Behind Obama Again?

Tanden: Why Liberal Dissatisfaction With Obama Is Way Overblown

Last week, as Democratic candidates across the country reached out to female voters in the final swing before Election Day, the White House released a report on how the president's economic agenda helps women. The report highlights the Obama's administration's efforts and accomplishments on behalf of women's economic success—small business expansion that helps female business owners, jobs tax credits that will help women (and men) find jobs, and laws to enforce equal pay for equal work, among other initiatives. Yet the report passed with little fanfare and even less media attention—like so many other aspects of the president's remarkably pro-woman policy agenda.

It's almost tragic how this agenda has fallen under the radar during Obama's first two years in office. We hear too often about abortion's controversial role in the year-long health care negotiations—but not enough about other women-centered issues that, after being promoted by activists for years, have finally made it into legislation. These go beyond the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act. The American Reinvestment and Recovery Act dramatically expanded child care provisions and Head Start. The health care bill contained over $1 billion to support nurses visiting new and expectant mothers at home, a program that women's groups and economists alike have championed as a smart investment. An even bigger victory is the CLASS Act, also part of the health care bill, which provides a basic cash benefit to people (often women) who are taking care of the elderly at home.

Yet I can probably count on my hand the number of people, including women, who actually know about these new laws. Amid the din of bad news about the economy and misinformation about health care reform, these policies don't stand a chance, sadly, of getting much media coverage. It doesn't help that the Democrats haven't done enough to shine a public spotlight on them.

But they could soon be lost in an even deeper abyss: The rampant individualism and free-market fundamentalism supported by the Republican Party, which seems on the precipice of controlling the House and possibly the Senate, could undo these initiatives entirely. What's more, the new Republican wave could mute the voice of women and their most important advocates on the national stage.

The Tea Parties, fueled by wealthy multimillionaires, are running extreme candidates—including women like Sharron Angle and Christine O'Donnell—who want to get rid of policies that help women the most. If the health care bill gets repealed, for instance, the new provisions for long-term care would go out the window, making decades worth of advocacy work moot.

But the Tea Parties threaten women in other ways, too. If the Republicans take back the House, the Democratic Party will lose one of its most powerful women: Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who currently has more clout than any woman on the other side of the aisle. Meanwhile, Republicans like Sarah Palin and Nikki Haley will only gain political power—and, with that power, attract more attention to their extreme views. If these Republicans become the nation's loudest voices of seemingly strong women, that could portend for a shift among younger women's allegiances toward the Republican Party and its platform.

Already, despite the stark realities about what Republicans will likely take away from women once they are in power, we are seeing rumbling of such a change: After forming the backbone of Democratic majorities for years, working-class women are wobbling in their support for the Obama administration. According to a Wall Street Journal poll from last week, while female college graduates favor Democratic over Republican control (56 percent to 36 percent), women with only some college or a vocational education are running almost even (45 percent to 44 percent).

Perhaps, in their growing economic anxiety, this group of women wants to throw out incumbents they perceive have not sufficiently focused on their economic progress. But, of course, if the media paid more attention to Obama's pro-woman agenda—and both advocates and policymakers did more to broadcast it—these key voters would know that the Democrats, not Republicans, are the politicians who have their interests in mind.

Democrats can't let this continue—they can't allow Republicans to brand themselves as the party of strong female leaders, or allow women to gradually become a constituency of the right. That's why it's critical to have standout women in the party. If Pelosi loses, is there a powerful enough Democratic woman to compete with these Republicans in the national spotlight? There's Hillary Clinton who, as Secretary of State, has sent a powerful signal to the country and the world about the importance of female leadership in the Obama administration. But, as a technically non-partisan international figure, Hillary won't be able to do public battle with the rising right.

Perhaps a Governor Sink—if she wins—in Florida could be among a new class of strong female Democrats. The Obama administration would also do well to elevate women in the executive branch and turn public attention to those who are already there.

In addition to presenting women as the face of the party, Democrats must focus on issues like long-term care, child care, and equal pay, all of which could rise to the legislative fore in the coming months. Republicans will likely directly attack or cut back investments in these initiatives. When this happens, the White House (and Democrats more broadly) would be wise to explain what it will mean for women if these initiatives are gutted or lost—and to fight tooth and nail to make sure that doesn't happen.

If it doesn't take these steps, the Democratic Party could lose its grasp on a critical, even central part of its coalition. And women, in the long run, would suffer under conservative laws that parrot family values, but do nothing to value families.

See below. Terrific piece from the BBC which I will circulate.

Meant to mention yesterday that I am going to Buenos Aires, Montevideo and Santiago next week. In Buenos Aires and Montevideo I will speaking at two business conferences being hosted by Council of the Americas and in Chile I will be visiting some of the public diplomacy programs we launched after the earthquake.

You may recall that I have a long-standing relationship with Christina Kirchner going back to my Discovery days. We had quite a large and successful business there. We are trying to arrange for me to meet with her when I am in BA and Arturo has briefed me on points he would like me to make if I get to spend some time with her.

I thought yesterday went well although I think it is going to be hard going to keep the world interested and committed to raising the necessary funding.

Haroon Rashid,
Kalam Valley, NorthWeat Pakistan

A population of around 70,000 in Pakistan's remote Kalam valley in Swat district is cut off after road links were swept away by flood waters three weeks back. Dozens of multi-story hotels perched on the river banks can't be seen anymore. The people are without electricity and telephone services too.

But despite this dismal picture, what follows natural disasters is not always all bad.

International assistance led by the US forces here is changing people's perceptions while local volunteers have joined hands to start rebuilding bridges and roads to restore their connection with the outside world.

Until last year Kalam, as rest of the Swat district, was hit hard by Islamic militancy. They espoused anti-US agenda. But Pakistani troops helped by local people flushed the Taleban out of the picturesque valley surrounded by tall green mountains. The incident of a few women too killing some Taleban is still proudly told here.

With the routing of Taleban last year and arrival of the US Marines helicopters in Kalam, local perception of the Americans is changing fast. Suddenly the local population, mostly Pashtoon, now appreciate the American presence.

Thirty-year old Habib Rasul, a local Taxi driver, says before floods they used to consider Americans enemy. "We used to consider them bad, our enemies. Muslim countries did not give us any assistance but they did so they're good."

Kalam is cut off by road. Depending on weather, US military helicopters are bringing in relief goods, mostly flour and medicines in a number of sorties each day. They land at Kalam's green Shahi ground where hundreds of affectees' sit around the helipad waiting for their turn for aid or to be taken on board.

Despite the helipad open to general public, no untoward incident has so far taken place. But the Pakistani authorities it seems don't wish to take any chances. Apart from two Pakistani military commandoes on each chopper, the helipad's security is in the Pakistani military's hands.

On their way back, these Blackhawks take the sick and the wounded out of the secluded valley.

'A friend in need is a friend indeed. In the past we thought the Americans were supporting militants, that it was their game, but now I am sure ninety-five percent of people in Kalam believe they are friends," says a local social worker Ehsanul Haq. "We're grateful to them."

Kalam is a place for leisure lover and hikers. The small tourist resort had around 300 small and medium sized hotels. But the spread of militancy had badly affected the local hotel economy for two years. In a bid to attract tourists and restore their confidence, the military in July held a festival in Kalam. But a few days later, floods wreaked havoc with the local hotel industry. Over 4000 tourists had to be evacuated in helicopters. The local hoteliers fear getting the tourists back now would take a lot of time.

Another positive thing to come out of the current disaster is the local population's decision not to wait for any government help and start rebuilding bridges and clear roads.

Malik Ghazan Khan, head of local volunteers, told the BBC they know if they look towards the government it could take months or even years. "We are doing it on the basis of self help because who else can assist us at this moment except God. The Chief Minister has told us they can't do it immediately. He said they had to go through processes and procedures so it takes time. So we have decided to do it ourselves by taking God name. I salute the brave people of Kalam, they have so far reconstructed six bridges. We have made 18 to 20 kms road useable now."

These volunteers have their own problems. Three fell in the gushing river Swat in front of us while putting a log across the river. Luckily all three were rescued but one had his leg broken and had to be evacuated the next day.

Like food and medicines, fuel is in short supply too. A volunteer Noorul Ahad told me they don't have the fuels. "While fasting its impossible for us to travel 20 kms up and down a day."

LAHORE (Reuters) – Two bombs exploded at a Shi'ite procession in the Pakistani city of Lahore, killing at least three people and wounding 25, police and witnesses said, after a lull in violence during devastating floods. The attacks came after two days of government air raids on militant strongholds in the northwest region.

H: Pat Lang's view of the resumed talks. Sid

"Israeli-Palestinian peace talks expected to resume in September" Washpost

"The Middle East peace process resumed in May, after a hiatus of 19 months, but it stalled again over the terms of moving from indirect talks, mediated by U.S. envoy George Mitchell, to direct negotiations.
Israel insists it is ready for direct talks, provided there are no preconditions. The Palestinians are ready provided there is a clear agenda. Israel says an agenda means preconditions. Resolving the snag over terms is crucial, diplomats say." Washpost

The former NY Times reporter Judy Miller likes to address me as "gloomy gus" or some such thing when I encounter her. Well, stand by for some more gloom.
The second Camp David talks failed because Dennis Ross and company placed the Palestinian delegation in a position in which a "solution" was demanded and expected by the Americans and Israelis on the basis of bargaining during the negotiations themselves.
This seemed reasonable at the time to the US and Israeli negotiators. After all, is this not what one does? Should not the outcome be the product of the dialectic of argument and persuasion?
Arabs generally think not. They tend to believe that negotiations are for the purpose of of arranging the details of outcomes that are understood in advance of the conference itself. For them, anything else is an attempt to win concessions through trickery.
"The Palestinians are ready provided there is a clear agenda. Israel says an agenda means preconditions."
Hello! What kind of nonsense is this? Have we learned nothing?
And then, there is the "little" matter of the non-participation of Hamas. Does the Obama Administration really think that this 600 pound gorilla can be ignored? Is this some sort of scheme on the part of Natanyahu, and "the boys" to discredit Abbas so that an isolated Hamas can be attacked and destroyed later?
Realism in diplomacy is a desirable thing. George Mitchell used to be smarter than this. His staff should be advising him not to do this. Failure will be catastrophic.
All the players should be engaged, and they are not. The outcome should be known in advance and it is not.
This is both childish and destructive. pl

What Created the Populist Explosion and How Democrats Can Avoid the Shrapnel in November

To say that the American people are angry is an understatement. The political brain of Americans today reflects a volatile mixture of fear and fury, and when you mix those together, you get an explosion. The only question at this point is how to mitigate the damage when the bomb detonates in November.

The bad news is that it's too late for Democrats to do what would have been both good policy and good politics (and what the House actually did do), namely to pass a major jobs bill when it was clear that the private sector couldn't keep Americans employed. The "Obama Doctrine" should have been that Americans who want to work and have the ability to contribute to our productivity as a nation should have the right to work, and that if the private sector can't meet the demand for jobs, we have plenty of roads and bridges to fix, new energy sources to develop and manufacture, and schools to build and renovate so our kids and workers returning for training can compete in the 21st century global economy. From having spent much of the last four years testing messages on a range of issues, from immigration to taxes and deficits, I can say with some certainty that nothing John Boehner or Eric Cantor could say could come within 30 points of generating the enthusiasm -- particularly among swing voters -- of a message that began, "We don't have a shortage of work ethic in this country, we have a shortage of work." That message resonates across the political spectrum. And it isn't even the strongest message we've tested in the last weeks or months that beats back the toughest deficit-cutting language the other side can muster.

But it's too late for that. The administration opted for an alternative doctrine, which Larry Summers enunciated on This Week several months ago: that unemployment is going to remain high for the foreseeable future and eventually come down -- as if there's nothing we can do about it -- and that they will push here and there for small symbolic measures whose symbolism tends to escape people who are out of work. It's hard to be excited by symbolism when your children are hungry or the bank is repossessing your home -- although you didn't do anything to deserve it -- while the people who did are once again making out like bandits.

Although the situation looks bleak for Democrats in November, it ain't over 'til it's over. Republicans are shooting themselves in the foot all over the country, running Tea Party candidates who are so far to the right you can't see Middle America from their porch. And some endangered Democrats will likely see victory in November from theirs if they understand the public mood and speak to it.

What is that public mood? It can be characterized by a single phrase -- populist anger -- and it cuts across partisan lines. On the right, it is alloyed with racial anxiety and prejudice. On the left, it is alloyed with tremendous disappointment at what could have been if we had the kind of bold leadership for which times like these cry out. And among people in the vast political center, populist anger is alloyed with anxiety and uncertainty -- about their jobs, their homes, and their children's future.

How to Create a Populist Explosion: A Tragedy in Two Acts

So how did we get here? The story can be told as a tragedy in two acts.

Act I: The GOP Sets the Country on a Course of Economic Destruction and the President Calls for Truth and Reconciliation without the Truth Part

- A strong economic downturn devolves into a Great Recession, as the stock market crashes and major banks fail. By October 2008, upper middle class moderate Republicans in the suburbs are so frightened by what's happening to their assets that they're willing to give Democrats a chance.
- A Republican administration that believes in neither government nor regulation creates a 700 billion bank bailout with no accountability. Unlike Republicans, who would say "no" in a situation like this and let a Great Recession turn into a Great Depression, Democrats do the right thing, but they don't make it clear from the start that these are Bush Bailouts and remind Americans, over and over, that the cause of all the bankruptcies is the bankruptcy of Republican ideology.
- A charismatic young president raises people's hopes and expectations, as he uniquely can. Americans are frightened, but they are willing and waiting to hear an alternative narrative to "government is the problem, not the solution" and a path back to economic recovery and security.
- The White House refuses to tell the American people three stories they desperately need to hear.
- The first is why the economy has gone into the ditch, and who did it. The president is steadfast in his position that we should "look forward, not backward," even as the GOP is blocking his every initiative to clean up its mess. As conservative attacks on him and Democrats increase, he refuses to indict the Republicans in Congress or President Bush for having destroyed our economy and putting one in eight Americans out of work and one in five either behind on their mortgage or in the process of having their homes foreclosed by the same bankers who gambled them away. Why did he need to tell the American people who was responsible for their misery -- and to repeat it again and again? Because otherwise, if the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression didn't subside within a year and half, voters would start to associate it with him and his party. This is Neuroscience 101 -- it's how mental associations are formed. But the president never even uttered George W. Bush's name in his first year in office, and the first time he did mention Bush was to appoint him, along with former President Clinton, to co-lead American relief efforts in Haiti. The president doesn't like putting antagonists in any of his stories, but if forced to, he would cite unnamed "naysayers," "Washington politics as usual," or "Congress," which was counterproductive given that Congress was held by his party. The guiding belief at the White House implicit in this messaging strategy was that Americans have a good grasp on economics and good memories.
- The second story the American people needed to hear from the president was why deficit spending is essential when the economy is spiraling downward. It's not a hard story to tell, even in a sound bite. But one of the best educators to occupy the Oval Office in decades chose not to educate -- he actually did it once, with prodding, but never repeated what was a superb explanation --- nor did he remind voters every time his opponents attacked him for deficit spending that they had left him with a 1.2 trillion dollar deficit on the day he walked into office because of their unpaid-for tax cuts to millionaires and unpaid-for war on Iraq that called on no one to sacrifice except our soldiers and their families (and our kids and grandkids, who will be paying off this war for generations). A year later, with Democrats on the ropes, the president started to tell that story. It was the right move, but appeared defensive because it hadn't been part of his guiding narrative from the start.
- The third story the president needed to offer was an alternative narrative on government. The president and his party were about to offer effective government as a solution to multiple problems after 30 years of solid branding by conservatives since Ronald Reagan about how government is the problem. But the narrative never came.
- The White House and Democratic Congress pass what virtually all economists outside the Goldman Sachs-to-Washington pipeline consider a half-stimulus that they predict will likely produce half-results. It fulfilled its promise. But the equally predictable political result was a discrediting of the concept of government intervention to stimulate the economy in the eyes of the public -- enough to scare off Democratic lawmakers from doing what they learned about Keynesian economics in intro economics for the indefinite future. Instead of blasting the Republicans for having hurled the country toward an abyss that would now take drastic measures to avert and warning the American people that this could easily be the first of two or three trillion-dollar packages that might be needed to get Americans back to work and to get the gears of the economy grinding again before we could start returning to the kinds of surpluses Bill Clinton had left the last time a Democrat was in the White House, the president chose to compromise with a party that was so unpopular when he took office that only 20 percent of voters at that point would even admit to a pollster that they considered themselves Republicans -- the lowest point for the GOP since the rise of public opinion polling 50 years earlier.

- The economy continues its free-fall, shedding 700,000 jobs a month. Meanwhile, Democrats don't take the kind of dramatic steps necessary to stop the bleeding. Americans are becoming desperate, but they remain hopeful that this new president will turn things around, and that perhaps the jobs provisions of the new "stimulus" act will do cauterize the wound. Meanwhile, the stimulus is being portrayed by Republicans as a mixture of pork and fat, and no one is effectively answering the charges, creating increasingly negative associations to an act that was never adequately crafted or sold.
- The logical follow-up to a bill designed to pull the economy out of a ditch is to make such a bill unnecessary in the future, by attacking Wall Street for having thrown us into crisis and passing strong legislation to rein in the excesses that created the economic meltdown. This would have sealed the American people's loyalty to the new president and Congress. (Heading into November, this is, in fact, the most popular piece of legislation the Democrats have passed, but it took them nearly a year and a half to get there, and by then, neither the president nor the Democratic Congress enjoyed the good will of the average American.) Instead, the same banks that received bailouts are foreclosing in record rates on the homeowners whose payroll taxes funded the bailouts but don't seem to get the same kind of attention to their needs from the federal government. Adding insult to injury, the banks double and triple credit card interest rates to as high as 30 percent, including on people's existing credit card debt -- while continuing to receive no-interest loans from the federal government.
- Despite talk of accountability, no one is fired (except one auto executive), virtually no one is prosecuted or even investigated as far as anyone knows, and banks that received bailouts flaunt record bonuses.

Act II: An Anemic Economy Meets an Anemic Health Care Plan

- The public has been clamoring for health care reform. Over 40 million people don't have health insurance at all, and the 85 percent of voters who do have health care have seen their costs double during the Bush years at the same time as real income has declined. Effective narratives on health care are widely available that win by a 2:1 margin against the toughest Harry-and-Louise anti-reform language from the other side. The opposition knows it, as evident in a leaked memo by Republican wordsmith Frank Luntz, who warns that this will be an uphill climb for opponents of reform, who would do well to accept some major elements of it.
- But instead of using any of the well-tested narratives that were highly effective during the campaign or devising any new ones of its own, the administration decides to try to "sell" health care without a narrative. (I wrote about this in detail a year ago and will not repeat that history here, except in telegraphic form.) The president refuses to state where he stands on any of the substantive debates about health reform for a year, such as whether we should have a "public option" (a term so ill-conceived it's hard to believe the public supported it anyway; imagine the support it might have received if it had been called instead "the one health care plan the health insurance companies don't get to control"). Instead, the White House uses phrases such as "bending the cost curve" while conservatives flood the airwaves with evocative phrases such as "government takeover," "a bureaucrat between you and your doctor," and "death panels."
- Instead of using Big Pharma and the health insurance industry as the villains of the health care story, which would explain why we need an overhaul rather than a Band-Aid, the White House once again offers a story without protagonists or antagonists, and cuts secret deals with both industries that become public.
- Over interminable months of trying to get the votes of the same Republicans who fought against Medicare for seniors for 30 years until the program was just too popular to keep attacking it and who are still trying to gut Social Security despite its popularity, the public then watches what George Will describes as the "serial bribery" of Republican and Democratic Senators alike, as each gets to take his or her turn as the 60th vote.
- At the 11th hour, as a compromise plan is finally going to pass, the president nixes the idea of a Medicare-like alternative Americans can choose over a health-insurance industry plan if they so desire, despite 60 percent of even swing voters wanting it included in the bill.
- Instead of being the signature bill that demonstrates both that Democrats can govern effectively and that government can be a force for good for working and middle class Americans (who have just been told that the better plans they've negotiated or been offered for years by their employers are "Cadillacs" that are going to be taxed out of existence), the entire process proves to the average American that government can't do anything right and scares moderate Democrats away from voting for any other bill that would ever put them on the record supporting government or spending.
- "Government" hits an all-time low in the polls, matching the popularity of big corporations, CEOs, and bailouts.
- Populist anger emerges as the primary emotion across the political spectrum, and the president's job approval with swing voters drops into the high thirties.

- Following the conventional wisdom, Democrats return to their all-too-familiar defensive crouch, and conclude that when in trouble, tack right. On health care, the president and his Cabinet fan out all over television to "reassure" the public on health care that abortion won't be covered (thanks for the reassurance, but most of us didn't find that reassuring), that domestic partners won't be covered, and that immigrants won't be covered. None of these issues needed to be conceded. (I know this because I tested messages on them, and well- messaged progressive positions on them would have boosted the popularity of the bill with swing voters.)
- The White House starts adopting failed conservative policies and talking points that leave the public utterly confused about where the president, and by extension, his party, stands on the central issues of the day. The president talks about cutting deficits and increasing spending in the same breath, using the metaphor of families tightening their belt in tough times, which only strengthens resolve against stimulating a faltering economy; pledges support for massively expanding offshore drilling and "clean coal" (which doesn't exist, by the way) in a speech on climate change; and sends in 1200 additional National Guards to Arizona as an apparent reward for passing "No Latino Left Behind," while publicly objecting to the legislation.
- The underlying psychological assumption of these moves is that if you mix policies from the right and left in equal parts, you win the center. In fact, no one has ever won the center that way. It appears weak, opportunistic, and incoherent to the average swing voter, which is particularly problematic at a time when people in the center desperately want to know that their leaders have a vision and a coherent plan for what to do (which is why both FDR and Ronald Reagan were so effective in moving voters in the center). It doesn't win any votes on the right. But it does have one predictable effect: It sucks the motivation out of your base, who feel demoralized and betrayed (if they're part of the "professional left") or less likely to vote (if they're average voters who don't follow politics carefully but just don't feel very enthusiastic anymore, even if they don't really know why).
- Capping it all off, the BP disaster occurs two weeks after the president has adopted the "drill here, drill now," "all of the above" position of the Republican Party and the oil companies. This could have been the perfect opportunity to go on the offensive, contrast what Democrats stand for (common sense, protection of our safety, the land we leave our children, and key American industries and jobs, and sticking up for ordinary Americans against big businesses and their lobbyists) with what Republicans stand for; and connect the dots between what happened on Wall Street (with regulators owned and operated by the companies they were supposed to regulate) and what happened in the Gulf (where precisely the same thing happened). Instead, the administration finds itself on the defensive, increasingly sounding like a subsidiary of BP, allowing BP to call the shots and control information for weeks, defending increasingly hard-to-believe statistics, and issuing press releases that appear indistinguishable from those issued by BP but are inconsistent with assessments of independent scientists.

Where Do We Go from Here?

So that is where we find ourselves today: a Democratic Party and Democratic base that is demoralized and unlikely to vote in high numbers in November; a Republican Party that is selling replanted Bushes with tremendous enthusiasm; and a vast political center filled with voters who are utterly confused and unsure who to turn to but certain that things aren't going well.

In January 2009 no one could have predicted that Democrats would be in this predicament today. Perhaps Democrats might lose a few seats lost in an off-year election, but certainly no more than that. We had just seen -- and the American public knew we had just seen -- the most disastrous performance by a president and party in living history, and the American people had elected a tremendously charismatic young president with enormous Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress. They had given the president and Congress a strong mandate for whatever kind of change was necessary to get us out of economic free-fall and to put Americans back to work.

But there were red flags already by the end of Obama's first week in office that led me to offer the following advice to the new administration: Tell the story of how we got in this mess or you'll own it. Tell a coherent story about deficit spending. Re-brand government because there's only one story out there now (Reagan's), and it's not one that supports a progressive agenda. Never let attacks go unanswered, because doing so only emboldens your opposition and leads the public to believe that you have no answers to them. And if you throw a bipartisan party and no one comes, don't throw another one. All of what followed has been as predictable as it has been unfortunate. A year and a half later, the White House hasn't consistently done any of these things, although the President is now intermittently doing some of them, and when he does, he does them well.

The question today is whether Democrats can channel the populist anger we are seeing around the country this late in the game. The answer is that we'd better try. Having recently tested messages on economics and jobs, including how to talk about deficits and taxes -- widely assumed to be Democrats' Achilles Heel, particularly now -- there is little question that if Democrats and progressives from center to left simply say what they believe in ways that are evocative, values-driven, and speak to people's worries and anger, many stand a good chance of surviving November, particularly when their opponents have nothing to say other than warmed-over rhetoric about cutting taxes to millionaires and multinationals and fiscal restraint except where it cuts into profits of their campaign contributors. Even the most evocative boilerplate conservative messages fall flat against honest messages that speak to the need to get Americans working again. And on issue after issue, no message is more resonant right now than one that sides with working and middle class Americans and small business owners against special interests, big business, and their lobbyists.

But actions speak louder than words, and Americans want to see action. It may be too late for the kind of jobs bill we should have seen a year and a half ago, but it isn't too late for Democrats to go on the offensive against the Republicans -- virtually all of them -- who opposed extending unemployment insurance to millions of Americans who were thrown out of work by the Republicans' corporate sponsors. It isn't too late for Democrats to contrast their support for the highly popular aid to state and local governments that just saved the jobs of hundreds of thousands of teachers, firefighters, and police all over the country with Republicans' desire to throw them out onto the street. It isn't too late to make a voting issue out of the bill the Republicans are stalling that would give small businesses a fighting chance in an economy stacked against them, and to make clear that one party stands for small businesses, which create 75 percent of the new jobs in this country, and the other party stands for big businesses that outsource American jobs and offshore their profits to avoid paying their fair share of American taxes. It's not too late to pass a bill that would limit credit card interest rates to a reasonable percent above the rate at which credit is made available to credit card companies. It's not too late to pass the first badly need "fix" to the health care reform act to demonstrate to Americans that Democrats mean it when they say this was just the first step, namely a law that stops insurance companies from increasing their premiums by 40 percent while cutting the size of their networks by 50-75 percent, which violates the principles of affordability and choice that were so essential to efforts to sell health care reform to the public. It's not too late to vow to change the rules of the Senate to prevent the use of the filibuster to give every special interest veto power over every important piece of legislation. It's not too late to introduce legislation that's been on hold in both the House and Senate to guarantee fair elections, so that the voice of everyday Americans is heard over the voice of the special interests that finance political campaigns.

On every one of these issues, a strong populist message trounces anything the other side can say. But Democrats need to play offense. They need to take up-or-down votes on bill after bill, including those they expect the other side to block, knowing that every one of those votes has the leverage of a campaign ad behind it. They need to change the narrative from what sounds to the average American like a whiny and impotent one -- "the Republicans won't let us do it" -- to a narrative of strength in numbers shared with their constituents. And they need to make every election a choice between two well-articulated approaches to governance -- and to offer their articulation of both sides' positions and values.

That leads to a final point. What Democrats have needed to offer the American people is a clear narrative about what and who led our country to the mess in which we find ourselves today and a clear vision of what and who will lead us out. That narrative would have laid a roadmap for our elected officials and voters alike, rather than making each legislative issue a seemingly discrete turn onto a dirt road. That narrative might have included -- and should include today -- some key elements: that if the economy is tumbling, it's the role of leadership and government to stop the free-fall; that if Wall Street is gambling with our financial security, our homes, and our jobs, true leaders do not sit back helplessly and wax eloquent about the free market, they take away the dice; that if the private sector can't create jobs for people who want to work, then we'll put Americans back to work rebuilding our roads, bridges, and schools; that if Big Oil is preventing us from competing with China's wind and solar energy programs, then we'll eliminate the tax breaks that lead to dysfunctional investments in 19th century fuels and have a public-private partnership with companies that will create the clean, safe fuels of the 21st century and the millions of good American jobs that will follow.

That's what Democrats stand for. It's time they said it.

Thanks for your nice words. They mean a lot. I will always, always play for your team, officially or not!

Many more thoughts on sports diplomacy that I'm excited about. And yes, once a jock, now an aging jock!

On QDDR article, you'll see that a lot is missing (most notably a section on the Middle East, as well as China, Western Hemisphere (we should probably mention ECPA), a good energy example per David Goldwyn, et. al). it may also be too Pakistan heavy, though it is a great example of everything we are trying to do. My main goal was to try to ground the many elements at play in a more coherent narrative with a theme and thread that carried through. Didn't have enough time on the bottom third. Hopefully this version gives us something to work with, though.

And I really hope you get some semblance of time off this week. If only the world would, for once, cooperate.

1. Not only is Shaun eager to come to the NI conference but Ed Miliband also very much would like him to attend. Should Shaun contact Jake or Declan, or should they contact him? Ed M. would like Shaun to establish the channel to you and also through me. If you have time the three of us might meet to discuss current UK politics and policies.
2. Joe Wilson is in Washington next week for the special advance showing of the movie, "Fair Game," (starring Sean Penn as Joe, Naomi Watts as Valerie). He wants to know if you want to attend one of the showings or whether he can arrange for a special private showing for you.

DAHIAT AL-BARID (AP) - The Palestinian prime minister has staked a new claim in Israel-controlled east Jerusalem, announcing that his government has helped fund the renovation of 14 schools there.

Israel said it will not give up any part of Jerusalem, including the eastern sector, which it captured in 1967. The Palestinians want to make east Jerusalem their future capital.

The Israeli government has tried to suppress any activity by Prime Minister Fayyad's Palestinian Authority in east Jerusalem and has warned him against entering Jerusalem on November 2 to make the announcement about the renovations.

Fayyad avoided confrontation and chose a West Bank school on the edge of Jerusalem. The West Bank government has spent more than $5 million on the renovations.

Vali--per your query, the cap I wore says "USAID from the People of the United States" and on the back "DART". It was practically the only sign, however temporary, that there was a US civilian effort in Sindh. So it got some media attention, which was good.

Every other country's aid here, even Iran's, is better branded than us. Only our helicopters are visible. China's field hospital (which I drove by in Thatta) Turkey, Saudi Arabia (I visited their refugee camp, where they are building a mosque), Australia (field hospital in multan), Switzerland, UK, etc. While we hide and the NGO partners refuse to admit that we fund them.

In addition, our employees are prevented from spending time in the affected areas, which they can visit only under very stringent conditions and heavy security imposed by RSOs. For example, the fabled AID DART teamn can hardly get out of I'bad and relies primarily on reports from NGois, a notably unreliable method.

We are going to try to change this. It won't be easy.

Hurricane Tomas in route to Haiti to hit 4 Nov right now on southern claw.

SouthCom's announcement:

USS IWO JIMA DEPLOYS TO HAITI AS TROPICAL STORM APPROACHES

MIAMI - U.S. Southern Command directed the amphibious ship USS Iwo Jima (LHD 7) to steam toward Haiti today in preparation for the forecasted arrival of tropical storm Tomas later this week.

Iwo Jima will deploy to Haiti from Suriname, where it arrived Thursday on its final country visit for Continuing Promise 2010, a four-month, humanitarian civic assistance deployment to eight nations in the Caribbean region. The ship is scheduled to arrive in Haiti later this week.

Large amphibious ships, like Iwo Jima, resemble small aircraft carriers and include the ability to support helicopter and landing craft operations to quickly move personnel and cargo, making it an ideal platform to support humanitarian-relief missions on short notice.

A crew of 1,600 military and civilian medical, engineering, aviation, logistical and other support personnel are embarked aboard Iwo Jima, including U.S. Navy engineers, a contingent of 500 Marines with logistical-support expertise, volunteers from the U.S. Public Health Service and various non-governmental organizations (NGOs), as well as medical, dental and engineering professionals from Europe, North America and South America.

Eight CH-46 Sea Knight, medium-lift, dual-rotor helicopters; two MH-60 Knight Hawk helicopters and two amphibious landing craft units (LCU's) are on Iwo Jima to support the ship's operations.

Iwo Jima is a Wasp-class amphibious ship capable of speeds in excess of 20 knots that can provide robust ship-to-shore, as well as shore-to-shore logistics support during contingencies ranging from traditional military operations to humanitarian and disaster-relief missions.

Because of the Caribbean region's history of severe-weather events during the peak months of the hurricane season, the ship has remained in the area throughout its present deployment, ready to support U.S. disaster relief efforts when directed.

Iwo Jima was in Port-de-Paix, Haiti, from July 24 through Aug. 3. It was the first stop on CP10 and the crew provided medical assistance to more than 4,000 Haitian citizens, performed 32 surgeries, completed six engineering projects, and delivered 231 pallets of humanitarian-assistance supplies donated by NGOs.

In September 2008, the amphibious ship USS Kearsarge deployed to Haiti to support U.S. relief efforts after a succession of storms (Fay, Gustav, Hanna and Ike) devastated the country. Kearsarge provided robust air and sealift support, delivering 3.3 million pounds of food, water and other aid to communities impacted by the disasters.

Subject: From Joe Wilson

Dear Hillary,

Next Sunday (October 17th) Valerie and I arrive in DC for a week of screenings of Fair Game, the film of our fight with the Bush administration. I plan to be in DC through the following Thursday. There are screenings in Silver Spring on Tuesday at the American Film Institute festival and on Wednesday in Georgetown as a benefit for the Treatment Action Group, an HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment organization. You, Potus (ret) and whomever you would like to bring are invited to either or both. Alternatively, I would be pleased to arrange a private screening for you and your guests either at your home or elsewhere. Depending on the time, either Valerie or I would be delighted to attend and answer questions afterwards.

If these dates do not work for you, I am also happy to ensure that a screening is arranged whenever is convenient.

Valerie and I think that the film tells the story of that time and are proud of it. I would be pleased to share it with you.

With warmest regards. Joe

America's Faltering Search for Peace in the Middle East: Openings for Others?

Remarks to staff of the Royal Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and, separately, to members of the Norwegian Institute of International Affairs

Ambassador Chas W. Freeman, Jr. (USFS, Ret.)
1 September 2010, Oslo, Norway

You have asked me to speak to current American policies in the Middle East, with an emphasis on the prospects for peace in the Holy Land. You have further suggested that I touch on the relationship of the Gulf Arabs, especially Saudi Arabia, to this. It is both an honor and a challenge to address this subject in this capital / at this ministry.

The declaration of principles worked out in Oslo seventeen years ago was the last direct negotiation between Israelis and Palestinian Arabs to reach consequential, positive results. The Oslo accords were a real step toward peace, not another deceptive pseudo-event in an endlessly unproductive, so-called "peace process." And if that one step forward in Oslo in 1993 was followed by several steps backwards, there is a great deal to be learned from how and why that happened.

There can be no doubt about the importance of today's topic. The ongoing conflict in the Holy Land increasingly disturbs the world's conscience as well as its tranquility. The Israel-Palestine issue began as a struggle in the context of European colonialism. In the post-colonial era, tension between Israelis and the Palestinians they dispossessed became, by degrees, the principal source of radicalization and instability in the Arab East and then the Arab world as a whole. It stimulated escalating terrorism against Israelis at home and their allies abroad. Since the end of the Cold War, the interaction between Israel and its captive Palestinian population has emerged as the fountainhead of global strife. It is increasingly difficult to distinguish this strife from a war of religions or a conflict of civilizations.

For better or ill, my own country, the United States has played and continues to play the key international part in this contest. American policies, more than those of any other external actor, have the capacity to stoke or stifle the hatreds in the Middle East and to spread or reverse their infection of the wider world. American policies and actions in the Middle East thus affect much more than that region.

Yet, as I will argue, the United States has been obsessed with process rather than substance. It has failed to involve parties who are essential to peace. It has acted on Israel's behalf to preempt rather than enlist international and regional support for peace. It has defined the issues in ways that preclude rather than promote progress. Its concept of a "peace process" has therefore become the handmaiden of Israeli expansionism rather than a driver for peace. There are alternatives to tomorrow's diplomatic peace pageant on the Potomac. And, as Norway has shown, there is a role for powers other than America in crafting peace in the Holy Land.

Over thirty years ago, at Camp David, Jimmy Carter pushed Israel through the door to peace that Egypt's Anwar Sadat had opened. Twenty years ago, the first Bush administration pressed Israel to the negotiating table with Palestinian leaders, setting the stage for their clandestine meetings in Oslo. The capacity of the United States to rally other governments behind a cause that it espouses may have atrophied, but American power remains far greater than that of any other nation. Nowhere is this more evident than in the Middle East.

For more than four decades, Israel has been able to rely on aid from the United States to dominate its region militarily and to sustain its economic prosperity. It has counted on its leverage in American politics to block the application of international law and to protect itself from the political repercussions of its policies and actions. Unquestioning American support has enabled Israel to put the seizure of ever more land ahead of the achievement of a modus vivendi with the Palestinians or other Arabs. Neither violent resistance from the dispossessed nor objections from abroad have brought successive Israeli governments to question, let alone alter the priority they assign to land over peace.

Ironically, Palestinians too have developed a dependency relationship with America. This has locked them into a political framework over which Israel exercises decisive influence. They have been powerless to end occupation, pogroms, ethnic cleansing, and other humiliations by Jewish soldiers and settlers. Nor have they been able to prevent their progressive confinement in checkpoint-encircled ghettos on the West Bank and the great open-air prison of Gaza.

Despite this appalling record of failure, the American monopoly on the management of the search for peace in Palestine remains unchallenged. Since the end of the Cold War, Russia – once a contender for countervailing influence in the region – has lapsed into impotence. The former colonial powers of the European Union, having earlier laid the basis for conflict in the region, have largely sat on their hands while ringing them, content to let America take the lead. China, India, and other Asian powers have prudently kept their political and military distance. In the region itself, Iran has postured and exploited the Palestinian cause without doing anything to advance it. Until recently, Turkey remained aloof.

On rare occasions, as in the case of the 1973 Arab oil embargo, the Arabs have backed their verbal opposition to Israel with action. Egypt and Jordan have settled into an unpopular coexistence with Israel that is now sustained only by U.S. subventions. Saudi Arabia has twice taken the initiative to offer Israel diplomatic concessions if it were to conclude arrangements for peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians. But, overall, Arab governments have earned the contempt of the Palestinians and their own people for their lack of serious engagement. For the most part, Arab leaders have timorously demanded that America solve the Israel-Palestine problem for them, while obsequiously courting American protection against Israel, each other, Iran, and – in some cases – their own increasingly frustrated and angry subjects and citizens.

Islam charges rulers with the duty to defend the faithful and to uphold justice. It demands that they embody righteousness. The resentment of mostly Muslim Arabs at their governing elites' failure to meet these standards generates sympathy for terrorism directed not just at Israel but at both the United States and Arab governments associated with it.

The perpetrators of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the United States saw it in part as reprisal for American complicity in Israeli cruelties to Palestinians and other Arabs. They justified it as a strike against Washington's protection of Arab governments willing to overlook American contributions to Muslim suffering. Washington's response to the attack included suspending its efforts to make peace in the Holy Land as well as invading and occupying Afghanistan and Iraq. All three actions inadvertently strengthened the terrorist case for further attacks on America and its allies. The armed struggle between Americans and Muslim radicals has already spilled over to Pakistan, Yemen, Somalia, and other countries. Authoritative voices in Israel now call for adding Iran to the list of countries at war with America. They are echoed by Zionist and neo-conservative spokesmen in the United States,

The widening involvement of Americans in combat in Muslim lands has inflamed anti-American passions and catalyzed a metastasis of terrorism. It has caused a growing majority of the world's 1.6 billion Muslims to see the United States as a menace to their faith, their way of life, their homelands, and their personal security. American populists and European xenophobes have meanwhile undercut liberal and centrist Muslim arguments against the intolerance that empowers terrorism by equating terrorism and its extremist advocates with Islam and its followers. The current outburst of bigoted demagoguery over the construction of an Islamic cultural center and mosque in New York is merely the most recent illustration of this. It suggests that the blatant racism and Islamophobia of contemporary Israeli politics is contagious. It rules out the global alliances against religious extremists that are essential to encompass their political defeat.

President Obama's inability to break this pattern must be an enormous personal disappointment to him. He came into office committed to crafting a new relationship with the Arab and Muslim worlds. His first interview with the international media was with Arab satellite television. He reached out publicly and privately to Iran. He addressed the Turkish parliament with persuasive empathy. He traveled to a great center of Islamic learning in Cairo to deliver a remarkably eloquent message of conciliation to Muslims everywhere. He made it clear that he understood the centrality of injustices in the Holy Land to Muslim estrangement from the West. He promised a responsible withdrawal from Iraq and a judicious recrafting of strategy in Afghanistan. Few doubt Mr. Obama's sincerity. Yet none of his initiatives has led to policy change anyone can detect, let alone believe in

It is not for me to analyze or explain the wide gaps between rhetoric and achievement in the Obama Administration's stewardship of so many aspects of my country's affairs. American voters will render their first formal verdict on this two months from tomorrow, on the 2nd of November. The situation in the Holy Land, Iraq, Afghanistan, and adjacent areas is only part of what they will consider as they do so. But I do think it worthwhile briefly to examine some of the changes in the situation that ensure that many policies that once helped us to get by in the Middle East will no longer do this.

Let me begin with the "peace process," a hardy perennial of America's diplomatic repertoire that the Obama Administration will put back on public display tomorrow. In the Cold War, the appearance of an earnest and "even-handed" American search for peace in the Holy Land was the price of U.S. access and influence in the Middle East. It provided political cover for conservative Arab governments to set aside their anger at American backing of Israel so as to stand with America and the Western bloc against Soviet Communism. It kept American relations with Israel and the Arabs from becoming a zero-sum game. It mobilized domestic Jewish support for incumbent presidents. Of course, there hasn't been an American-led "peace process" in the Middle East for at least a decade. Still the conceit of a "peace process" became an essential political convenience for all concerned. No one could bear to admit that the "peace process" had expired. It therefore lived on in phantom form.

Even when there was no "peace process," the possibility of resurrecting one provided hope to the gullible, cover to the guileful, beguilement for the press, an excuse for doing nothing to those gaining from the status quo, and – last but far from least – lifetime employment for career "peace processors." The perpetual processing of peace without the requirement to produce it has been especially appreciated by Israeli leaders. It has enabled them to behave like magicians, riveting foreign attention on meaningless distractions as they systematically removed Palestinians from their homes, settled half a million or more Jews in newly vacated areas of the occupied territories, and annexed a widening swath of land to a Jerusalem they insist belongs only to Israel.

Palestinian leaders with legitimacy problems have also had reason to collaborate in the search for a "peace process." It's not just that there has been no obviously better way to end their people's suffering. Playing "peace process" charades justifies the international patronage and Israeli backing these leaders need to retain their status in the occupied territories. It ensures that they have media access and high-level visiting rights in Washington. Meanwhile, for American leaders, engagement in some sort of Middle East "peace process" has been essential to credibility in the Arab and Islamic worlds, as well as with the ever-generous American Jewish community. Polls show that most American Jews are impatient for peace. Despite all the evidence to the contrary, they are eager to believe in the willingness of the government of Israel to trade land for it.

Previous "peace processes" have exploited all these impulses. In practice, however, these diplomatic distractions have served to obscure Israeli actions and evasions that were more often prejudicial to peace than helpful in achieving it. Behind all the blather, the rumble of bulldozers has never stopped. Given this history, it has taken a year and a half of relentless effort by U.S. Special Envoy George Mitchell to persuade the parties even to meet directly to talk about talks as they first did here in Oslo, seventeen years ago. When the curtain goes up on the diplomatic show in Washington tomorrow, will the players put on a different skit? There are many reasons to doubt that they will.

One is that the Obama administration has engaged the same aging impresarios who staged all the previously failed "peace processes" to produce and direct this one with no agreed script. The last time these guys staged such an ill-prepared meeting, at Camp David in 2000, it cost both heads of delegation, Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat, their political authority. It led not to peace but to escalating violence. The parties are showing up this time to minimize President Obama's political embarrassment in advance of midterm elections in the United States, not to address his agenda – still less to address each other's agendas. These are indeed difficulties. But the problems with this latest – and possibly final – iteration of the perpetually ineffectual "peace process" are more fundamental.

The Likud Party charter flatly rejects the establishment of a Palestinian Arab state west of the Jordan River and stipulates that: "The Palestinians can run their lives freely in the framework of self-rule, but not as an independent and sovereign state." This Israeli government is committed to that charter as well as to the Jewish holy war for land in Palestine. It has no interest in trading land it covets for a peace that might thwart further territorial expansion. It considers itself unbound by the applicable UN resolutions, agreements from past peace talks, the "Roadmap," or the premise of the "two-state solution."

The Palestinians are desperate for the dignity and security that only the end of the Israeli occupation can provide. But the authority of Palestinian negotiators to negotiate rests on their recognition by Israel and the United States, not on their standing in the occupied territories, Gaza, or the Palestinian diaspora. Fatah is the ruling faction in part of Palestine. Its authority to govern was repudiated by voters in the last Palestinian elections. The Mahmoud Abbas administration retains power by grace of the Israeli occupation authorities and the United States, which prefer it to the government empowered by the Palestinian people at the polls. Mr. Abbas's constitutional term of office has long since expired. He presides over a parliament whose most influential members are locked up in Israeli jails. It is not clear for whom he, his faction, or his administration can now speak.

So the talks that begin tomorrow promise to be a case of the disinterested going through the motions of negotiating with the mandate-less. The parties to these talks seek to mollify an America that has severely lessened international credibility. The United States government had to borrow the modest reputations for objectivity of others – the EU, Russia, and the UN – to be able to convene this discussion. It will be held under the auspices of an American president who was publicly humiliated by Israel's prime minister on the issue that is at the center of the Israel-Palestine dispute – Israel's continuing seizure and colonization of Arab land.

Vague promises of a Palestinian state within a year now waft through the air. But the "peace process" has always sneered at deadlines, even much, much firmer ones. A more definitive promise of an independent Palestine within a year was made at Annapolis three years ago. Analogous promises of Palestinian self-determination have preceded or resulted from previous meetings over the decades, beginning with the Camp David accords of 1979. Many in this audience will recall the five-year deadline fixed at Oslo. The talks about talks that begin tomorrow can yield concrete results only if the international community is prepared this time to insist on the one-year deadline put forward for recognizing a Palestinian state. Even then there will be no peace unless long-neglected issues are addressed.

Peace is a pattern of stability acceptable to those with the capacity to disturb it by violence. It is almost impossible to impose. It cannot become a reality, still less be sustained, if those who must accept it are excluded from it. This reality directs our attention to who is not at this gathering in Washington and what must be done to remedy the problems these absences create.

Obviously, the party that won the democratically expressed mandate of the Palestinian people to represent them – Hamas – is not there. Yet there can be no peace without its buy-in. Egypt and Jordan have been invited as observers. Yet they have nothing to add to the separate peace agreements each long ago made with Israel. (Both these agreements were explicitly premised on grudging Israeli undertakings to accept Palestinian self-determination. The Jewish state quickly finessed both.) Activists from the Jewish diaspora disproportionately staff the American delegation. A failure to reconcile either American Jews or the Palestine diaspora to peace would doom any accord. But the Palestinian diaspora will be represented in Washington only in tenuous theory, not in fact.

Other Arabs, including the Arab League and the author of its peace initiative, Saudi Arabia, will not be at the talks tomorrow. The reasons for this are both simple and complex. At one level they reflect both a conviction that this latest installment of the "peace process" is just another in a long series of public entertainments for the American electorate and also a lack of confidence in the authenticity of the Palestinian delegation. At another level, they result from the way the United States has defined the problems to be solved and the indifference to Arab interests and views this definition evidences. Then too, they reflect disconnects in political culture and negotiating style between Israelis, Arabs, and Americans.

To begin with, neither Israel nor the conveners of this proposed new "peace process" have officially acknowledged or responded to the Arab peace initiative of 2002. This offered normalization of relations with the Jewish state, should Israel make peace with the Palestinians. Instead, the United States and the Quartet have seemed to pocket the Arab offer, ignore its precondition that Israelis come to terms with Palestinians, and gone on to levy new demands.

In this connection, making Arab recognition of Israel's "right to exist" the central purpose of the "peace process" offends Arabs on many levels. In framing the issue this way, Israel and the United States appear to be asking for something well beyond pragmatic accommodation of the reality of a Jewish state in the Middle East. To the Arabs, Americans now seem to be insisting on Arab endorsement of the idea of the state of Israel, the means by which that state was established, and the manner in which it has comported itself. Must Arabs really embrace Zionism before Israel can cease expansion and accept peace?

Arabs and Muslims familiar with European history can accept that European anti-Semitism justified the establishment of a homeland for traumatized European Jews. But asking them even implicitly to agree that the forcible eviction of Palestinian Arabs was a morally appropriate means to this end is both a nonstarter and seriously off-putting. So is asking them to affirm that resistance to such displacement was and is sinful. Similarly, the Arabs see the demand that they recognize a Jewish state with no fixed borders as a clever attempt to extract their endorsement of Israel's unilateral expansion at Palestinian expense.

The lack of appeal in this approach has been compounded by a longstanding American habit of treating Arab concerns about Israel as a form of anti-Semitism and tuning them out. Instead of hearing out and addressing Arab views, U.S. peace processors have repeatedly focused on soliciting Arab acts of kindness toward Israel. They argue that gestures of acceptance can help Israelis overcome their Holocaust-inspired political neuroses and take risks for peace.

Each time this notion of Arab diplomacy as psychotherapy for Israelis has been trotted out, it has been met with incredulity. To most in the region, it encapsulates the contrast between Washington's sympathy and solicitude for Israelis and its condescendingly exploitative view of Arabs. Some see it as a barely disguised appeal for a policy of appeasement of Israel. Still others suspect an attempt to construct a "peace process" in which Arabs begin to supply Israel with gifts of carrots so that Americans can continue to avoid applying sticks to it.

The effort to encourage Arab generosity as an offset to American political pusillanimity vis-à-vis Israel is ludicrously unpersuasive. It has failed so many times that it should be obvious that it will not work. Yet it was a central element of George Mitchell's mandate for "peace process" diplomacy. And it appears to have resurfaced as part of the proposed follow-up to tomorrow's meeting between the parties in Washington. It should be no puzzle why the Saudis and other Arabs could not be persuaded to join this gathering.

As a last thought before turning to what must be done, let me make a quick comment on a relevant cultural factor. Arabic has two quite different words that are both translated as "negotiation," making a distinction that doesn't exist in either English or Hebrew. One word, "musaawama," refers to the no-holds-barred bargaining process that takes place in bazaars between strangers who may never see each other again and who therefore feel no obligation not to scam each other. Another, "mufaawadhat," describes the dignified formal discussions about matters of honor and high principle that take place on a basis of mutual respect and equality between statesmen who seek a continuing relationship.

Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's travel to Jerusalem was a grand act of statesmanship to initiate a process of mufaawadhat – relationship-building between leaders and their polities. So was the Arab peace initiative of 2002. It called for a response in kind. The West muttered approvingly but did not act. After a while, Israel responded with intermittent, somewhat oblique suggestions of willingness to haggle over terms. But an offer to bicker over the terms on which a grand gesture has been granted is, not surprisingly, seen as insultingly unresponsive.

I cite this not to suggest that non-Arabs should adopt Arabic canons of thought, but to make a point about diplomatic effectiveness. To move a negotiating partner in a desired direction, one must understand how that partner understands things and help him to see a way forward that will bring him to an end he has been persuaded to want. One of the reasons we can't seem to move things as we desire in the Middle East is that we don't make much effort to understand how others reason and how they rank their interests. In the case of the Israel-Palestine conundrum, we Americans are long on empathy and expertise about Israel and very, very short on these for the various Arab parties. The essential militarism of U.S. policies in the Middle East adds to our difficulties. We have become skilled at killing Arabs. We have forgotten how to listen to them or persuade them.

I am not myself an "Arabist," but I am old enough to remember when there were more than a few such people in the American diplomatic service. These were officers who had devoted themselves to the cultivation of understanding and empathy with Arab leaders so as to be able to convince these leaders that it was in their own interest to do things we saw as in our interest. If we still have such people, we are hiding them well; we are certainly not applying their skills in our Middle East diplomacy.

This brings me to a few thoughts about the Western and Arab interests at stake in the Holy Land and their implications for what must be done.

In foreign affairs, interests are the measure of all things. My assumption is that Americans and Norwegians, indeed Europeans in general, share common interests that require peace in the Holy Land. To my mind, these interests include – but are, of course, not limited to – gaining security and acceptance for a democratic state of Israel; eliminating the gross injustices and daily humiliations that foster Arab terrorism against Israel and its foreign allies and supporters, as well as friendly Arab regimes; and reversing the global spread of religious strife and prejudice, including, very likely, a revival of anti-Semitism in the West if current trends are not arrested. None of these aspirations can be fulfilled without an end to the Israeli occupation and freedom for Palestinians.

Arab states, like Saudi Arabia, also have compelling reasons to want relief from occupation as well as self-determination for Palestinians. They may not be concerned to preserve Israel's democracy, as we are, but they share an urgent interest in ending the radicalization of their own populations, curbing the spread of Islamist terrorism, and eliminating the tensions with the West that the conflict in the Holy Land fuels. These are the concerns that have driven them to propose peace, as they very clearly did eight years ago. For related reasons, Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah has made inter-faith dialogue and the promotion of religious tolerance a main focus of his domestic and international policy.

As the custodian of two of Islam's three sacred places of pilgrimage – Mecca and Medina – Saudi Arabia has long transcended its own notorious religious narrow-mindedness to hold the holy places in its charge open to Muslims of all sects and persuasions. This experience, joined with Islamic piety, reinforces a Saudi insistence on the exemption of religious pilgrimage to Jerusalem from political interference or manipulation. The Ottoman Turks were careful to ensure freedom of access for worship to adherents of the three Abrahamic faiths when they administered the city. It is an interest that Jews, Christians, and Muslims share.

There is, in short, far greater congruity between Western and Arab interests affecting the Israel-Palestine dispute than is generally recognized. This can be the basis for creative diplomacy. The fact that this has not occurred reflects pathologies of political life in the United States that paralyze the American diplomatic imagination. Tomorrow's meeting may well demonstrate that, the election of Barack Obama notwithstanding, the United States is still unfit to manage the achievement of peace between Israel and the Arabs. If so, it is in the American interest as well as everyone else's that others become the path-breakers, enlisting the United States as best they can in support of what they achieve, but not expecting America to overcome its incapacity to lead.

Here, I think, there is a lesson to be drawn from the Norwegian experience in the 1990s. The Clinton Administration was happy to organize the public relations for the Oslo accords but did not take ownership of them. It did little to protect them from subversion and overthrow, and nothing to insist on their implementation. Only a peace process that is protected from Israel's ability to manipulate American politics can succeed.

This brings me to how Europeans and Arabs might work together to realize the objectives both share with most Americans: establishing internationally recognized borders for Israel, securing freedom for the Palestinians, and ending the stimulus to terrorism in the region and beyond it that strife in the Holy Land entails. I have only four suggestions to present today. I expect that more ideas will emerge from the discussion period. A serious effort to cooperate with the Arabs of the sort that Norway is uniquely capable of contriving could lead to the development of still more options for joint or parallel action on behalf of peace.

Now to my suggestions, presented in ascending order of difficulty, from the least to the most controversial.

First, get behind the Arab peace initiative. Saudi Arab culture frowns on self-promotion and the Kingdom is less gifted than most at public diplomacy. Political factors inhibit official Arab access to the Israeli press. The Israeli media have published some – mostly dismissive – commentary on the Arab peace initiative but left most Israelis ignorant of its contents and unfamiliar with its text. Why not buy space in the Israeli media to give Israelis a chance to read the Arab League declaration and consider the opportunities it presents? I suspect the Saudis, as well as other members of the Arab League, would consider it constructive for an outside party to do this. It might facilitate other sorts of cooperation with them in which European capabilities can also compensate for Arab reticence. The Turks and other non-Arab Muslims should be brought in as full participants in any such efforts. This wouldn't be bad for Europe's relations with both. By the way, given the U.S. media's notorious one-sidedness and American ignorance about the Arab peace plan, a well-targeted advertising campaign in the United States might not be a bad idea either.

Second, help create a Palestinian partner for peace. There can be no peace with Israel unless there are officials who are empowered by the Palestinian people to negotiate and ratify it. Israel has worked hard to divide the Palestinians so as to consolidate its conquest of their homeland. Saudi Arabia has several times sought to create a Palestinian peace partner for Israel by bringing Fatah, Hamas, and other factions together. On each occasion, Israel, with U.S. support, has acted to preclude this. Active organization of non-American Western support for diplomacy aimed at restoring a unity government to the Palestinian Authority could make a big difference. The Obama Administration would be under strong domestic political pressure to join Israel in blocking a joint European-Arab effort to accomplish this. Under some circumstances, however, it might welcome being put to this test.

Third, reaffirm and enforce international law. The UN Security Council is charged with enforcing the rule of law internationally. In the case of the Middle East, however, the Council's position at the apex of the international system has served to erode and subvert the ideal of a rule-bound international order. Almost forty American vetoes have prevented the application to the Israeli occupying authorities of the Geneva Conventions, the Nuremberg precedents, human rights conventions, and relevant Security Council directives. American diplomacy on behalf of the Jewish state has silenced the collective voice of the international community as Israel has illegally colonized and annexed broad swaths of occupied territory, administered collective punishment to a captive people, assassinated their political leaders, massacred civilians, barred UN investigators, defied mandatory Security Council resolutions, and otherwise engaged in scofflaw behavior, usually with only the flimsiest of legally irrelevant excuses.

If ethnic cleansing, settlement activity, and the like are not just "unhelpful" but illegal, the international community should find a way to say so, even if the UN Security Council cannot. Otherwise, the most valuable legacy of Atlantic civilization – its vision of the rule of law – will be lost. When one side to a dispute is routinely exempted from principles, all exempt themselves, and the law of the jungle prevails. The international community needs collectively to affirm that Israel, both as occupier and as regional military hegemon, is legally accountable internationally for its actions. If the UN General Assembly cannot "unite for peace" to do what an incapacitated Security Council cannot, member states should not shrink from working in conference outside the UN framework. All sides in the murder and mayhem in the Holy Land and beyond need to understand that they are not above the law. If this message is firmly delivered and enforced, there will be a better chance for peace.

Fourth, set a deadline linked to an ultimatum. Accept that the United States will frustrate any attempt by the UN Security Council to address the continuing impasse between Israel and the Palestinians. Organize a global conference outside the UN system to coordinate a decision to inform the parties to the dispute that if they cannot reach agreement in a year, one of two solutions will be imposed. Schedule a follow-up conference for a year later. The second conference would consider whether to recommend universal recognition of a Palestinian state in the area beyond Israel's 1967 borders or recognition of Israel's achievement of de jure as well as de facto sovereignty throughout Palestine (requiring Israel to grant all governed by it citizenship and equal rights at pain of international sanctions, boycott, and disinvestment). Either formula would force the parties to make a serious effort to strike a deal or to face the consequences of their recalcitrance. Either formula could be implemented directly by the states members of the international community. Admittedly, any serious deadline would provoke a political crisis in Israel and lead to diplomatic confrontation with the United States as well as Israel, despite the Obama Administration itself having proclaimed a one-year deadline in order to entice the Palestinians to tomorrow's talks. Yet both Israel and the United States would benefit immensely from peace with the Palestinians.

Time is running out. The two-state solution may already have been overtaken by Israeli land grabs and settlement activity. Another cycle of violence is likely in the offing. If so, it will not be local or regional, but global in its reach. Israel's actions are delegitimizing and isolating it even as they multiply the numbers of those in the region and beyond who are determined to destroy it. Palestinian suffering is a reproach to all humanity that posturing alone cannot begin to alleviate. It has become a cancer on the Islamic body politic. It is infecting every extremity of the globe with the rage against injustice that incites terrorism.

It is time to try new approaches. That is why the question of whether there is a basis for expanded diplomatic cooperation between Europeans and Arabs is such a timely one. And it is why I was pleased as well as honored to have been asked to set the stage for a discussion of this issue.

Eyes on Hillary Clinton as She Leads Mideast Peace Talks

Opinions Are Split on Whether Secretary of State Has Skills Necessary for Negotiations

By JAKE TAPPER

WASHINGTON, Sept. 2, 2010 —

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton today stepped into the international spotlight, assuming the day-to-day responsibility of trying to broker a Mideast peace that has eluded her predecessors for decades.

Seated between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas at the State Department, Clinton heralded the first direct negotiations between the parties in nearly two years.

Whether both sides can overcome a history of failed negotiations and dashed hopes will depend in large part on the individual leaders making difficult concessions, Clinton said.

"We cannot and will not impose a solution. Only you can make the decisions necessary to reach an agreement and secure a peaceful future for the Israeli and Palestinian people," she said.

Clinton appeared to embrace the opportunity and the symbolism of the moment ▯ speaking slowly and authoritatively, embracing her partners on both sides, and reminding the world of the difficulties to be expected on the road ahead.

"Those who oppose the cause of peace will try in every way possible to sabotage this process, as we have already seen this week," she said, referring to the killing Tuesday of four Israeli civilians by Hamas.

But "the core issues at the center of these negotiations -- territory, security, Jerusalem, refugees, settlements and others -- will get no easier if we wait, nor will they resolve themselves."

The talks, which also included Jordan's King Abdullah II and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, represent a formidable challenge for Clinton, who has spent months coaxing both sides back to the negotiating table.

They also raise the stakes for President Obama, who has set a goal of creating a two-state solution. He met with Netanyahu and Abbas in private sessions at the White House Wednesday and said he was "cautiously hopeful" a deal could be reached one year from now.

But experts say success in the months ahead will also depend on Clinton's skill as a diplomat and mediator.

"I think she has credibility. Now whether that translates into diplomatic skills, I don't know," said Shibley Telhami, the Anwar Sadat professor for peace and development at the University of Maryland. "Frankly, she's untested as a mediator."

Other observers see Clinton's experience as a politician as an asset because she will be able to not only discuss the policies but understand the politics of how Palestinian and Israeli leaders "sell" the negotiations to their peoples at home.

In an ABC News exclusive interview, former British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Clinton has the best type of political mind. "[It] knows where you meet the point of principle and knows where you need the subtlety and the compromise," he said.

1979 Camp David Accords: the Gold Standard

Ahead of the talks, Clinton had requested historical background materials concerning past efforts at peace in the region, the ultimately unsuccessful one led by her husband, a source close to the secretary of state said.

"She has this relationship with this fellow who has spent some time talking to leaders -- you know President Clinton -- and she has benefitted from his direct experience," said State Department spokesman P.J. Crowley.

Clinton regards President Jimmy Carter's 1979 Camp David Accords brokered between Israel and Egypt as the gold standard for negotiations, the Clinton source said.

When then-Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin refused to authorize the dismantling of any Israeli settlements, Carter's team suggested having the Israeli Parliament make the decision -- and it did. Carter has credited thinking outside of the box and being innovative as the key.

"You have to be innovative and get a lot of outside help to find some alternative route that might bring you to the same goals," Carter told interviewer Don Richardson in "Conversations With Carter."

"You really need to look at life or the negotiation as if it were a chessboard. Anticipating what the next move is and what the next move is after that," said Aaron David Miller, an adviser on the region to six secretaries of state.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated an end to the 1973 Arab-Israeli war, said that audaciousness was part of testing the limits.

"The art of statesmanship is to find a position between stagnation and overextension, hopefully at the outer limit of what is possible," he said during a June 2008 interview on CNN.

Former President Clinton once suggested that willpower also comes in handy. In his autobiography, "My Life," he described one very late night at Wye River -- where he conducted his own Mideast peace talks -- where his "strategy for success had now boiled down to endurance; I was determined to be the last man standing."

What the negotiators are doing when they're not negotiating might also play a role, Carter has said. By holding peace talks at Camp David, "it was a harmonious environment because Egyptians and Israelis who had been devoting their adult life to killing each other were required to swim in the same swimming pool, watch the same movies, play on the same tennis courts, throw horseshoes together, sit on the same rock and talks. That was all part of it."

CAIRO (Reuters) - The Arab League backs the Palestinians' refusal to continue direct peace talks if Israel resumes building settlements, the organization's chief said September 16. "If settlement construction does not stop, then there is no use for continuing negotiations," Amr Moussa told a press conference, saying this was the opinion of the Arabs and Palestinian President Abbas. "Negotiating with occupation is simply a waste of time."

A quick note as I head for an interview with Israeli Channel 10. Have done intensive work today with regional media, including CNN-I, AJ and AJE, about 10 in all when the evening winds down. We have had a good day in shaping the outcome of today's activity. Coverage has been broadly supportive. The Palestinians went somewhat negative on Andrea Mitchell's show, but I appeared as did Michael Oren and we balanced that out fairly well. [redacted] B5

Jake just relayed your desire to cancel tomorrow's interview. But I want to make sure you are aware of a few things that he was not in a position to share:

1) The Israeli & Palestinian interviewers and their teams skipped returning home today with their principals at great cost and energy in order to stay the extra day to you. One skipped traveling onward with Abbas.
2) Both the Israeli & Palestinian media outlets involved immediately announced their joint interview and are hyping its unprecedented nature
3) Because of #2, U.S. media is fully aware that this interview is scheduled for tomorrow morning.

So three points:

1) There is an incredibly high expectation for this interview occurring and canceling, no matter the reason cited, will be taken to mean something negative2) The point of this interview was to shape the narrative coming out of today, and canceling will only contribute to a negative narrative in that we will be canceling on the most important figure in Israeli media, and I do not see Channel 2 taking that well3) As positive as the symbolism of this interview was meant to be, we run the risk of the negative symbolism by canceling.

Typically when you want to cancel something I roll with it. But I want to strenuously object to doing so in this case. I understand you told the participants they should refrain from public comment, but first, that doesn't mean you have to and second, you know they won't really refrain. And I am certain they will appreciate the effusive things you have to say about them during this interview. Not to mention that the reason for canceling is something we ourselves could have foreseen before going so far down the road, and should have - which I don't think is fair or reflects well on you.

Lastly, on a much more practical note: to get you out of this I am going to have to bribe Channel 2 with a significant and exclusive interview when we are in Jerusalem in two weeks, and I guarantee you that will be far more painful than tomorrow's relative short and peaceful format.

If you'd like to discuss I'm at my desk and available or can call you through Ops.

Omani minister discusses talks to release hiker From Nic Robertson, CNN

STORY HIGHLIGHTS
Negotiators had easy access to Obama, Ahmadinejad The talks stalled after five months An Iranian nuclear scientist caused "disturbance" in July The hikers have been held more than a year

(CNN) -- President Barack Obama had a key role during negotiations between the Omanis and Iranians that led to the release of an American hiker detained after she and two companions allegedly strayed across an unmarked border between Iraq and Iran.

Yusuf bin Alawai bin Abdullah, Oman's minister responsible for foreign affairs, told CNN that "indecision and confusion" at the White House at times delayed the talks -- which began eight months ago when the United States requested assistance securing the release of Sarah Shourd, Shane Bauer and Josh Fattal.

"The White House was confused because it was working on several different tracks at the same time," he said in a telephone interview. There were delays "due to the White House administration."

But it was Obama who cleared up any problems, bin Alawai said. It was "easy for us to talk directly to the president," he said.

The Omanis also dealt with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, saying that negotiators enjoyed good access to both leaders.

The talks "stalled" after only three months. But Omanis helped facilitate a visit from the hikers' families to Tehran.

Talks began again only because of concerns about Shourd's health, the minister said. A spokeswoman for the hikers' families told CNN that Shourd told her mother during their only visit together that she had found a lump in her breast.

Shourd, 32, was released from Tehran's Evin Prison and traveled to Oman on Tuesday. Omani sources paid a $500,000 bail, a senior U.S. administration official said.

Bin Alawai said that Shourd is "in good form and good health" in Oman. There is nothing to stop her "enjoying her life in the U.S.," he said, but she is welcome to stay in Oman as long as she likes.

"There is no pressure on her to leave," he said.

Bin Alawai would not say who paid Shourd's bail.

"I don't want to talk about that" because it might be of "help in the future," he said. He did say, however, that it was a "legal process" that had some "small" problems that were quickly overcome but led to a short delay in the announced release.

Administration officials were somewhat confused over how to deal with the Iranians on some of the issues that came up, the minister said, particularly in July when Iranian nuclear scientist Shahram Amiri appeared at the Iranian interests section of the Pakistani Embassy in Washington demanding a ticket to Tehran.

"It caused a disturbance at the White House," bin Alawai said.

U.S. officials said Amiri defected to the United States in 2009 and provided information about Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program. Iran maintains he was abducted by U.S. agents in Saudi Arabia. Despite the "disturbance," bin Alawai said, the idea of an exchange of Amiri for the hikers surfaced.

"The Iranians were ready to think about an exchange," he said, but at the White House "not everyone was on board at that time."

Bin Alawai avoided saying that Shourd's release was part of an exchange, but allowed that "it may have helped" that Amiri eventually returned to Iran.

Iran has accused the three hikers of spying, but no charges have been filed. Shourd's fiance, Bauer, and Fattal, both 28, remain at Evin Prison. They were detained on July 31, 2009.

Met Indra today for the first time. Spent the entire time not talking about me and my new law firm (!) but about you and why we both admired and supported you so. And still do.

She is a most remarkable person. And quite devoted to you.

Her daughter Preetha, as you may know, started in Iowa and stayed on in campaign as volunteer all the way through South Dakota and Montana.

And in all that time she never personally met you -- and "still grieves" (her mon's words) your loss. (Joining a big club!!!)

Can I call Cheryl and arrange a quick stop-by and handshake and photo any time--no rush--at your convenience?

Hope you are well - you look better than ever--as does President Clinton! And we are not getting any younger!!!

Warmest regards,

Lanny

Subject: (AP) Saudi king transfers National Guard duties to son

RIYADH (AP) - The Saudi king stepped down as head of the country's National Guard and transferred the influential position to his son, in an apparent sign that the elderly monarch is beginning to lessen his duties. The Saudi Press Agency reported that King Abdullah has named Prince Mitab bin Abdullah as commander of the National Guard. King Abdullah had headed the force since 1962. The 86-year-old king also handed over his traditional supervisory duties for the annual hajj pilgrimage to his deputy prime minister because doctors advised him to rest after rupturing a disc in his back. Abdullah appeared on Saudi television receiving well-wishers for the Eid al-Adha holiday.

USS IWO JIMA DEPLOYS TO HAITI AS TROPICAL STORM APPROACHES

MIAMI - U.S. Southern Command directed the amphibious ship USS Iwo Jima (LHD 7) to steam toward Haiti today in preparation for the forecasted arrival of tropical storm Tomas later this week.

Iwo Jima will deploy to Haiti from Suriname, where it arrived Thursday on its final country visit for Continuing Promise 2010, a four-month, humanitarian civic assistance deployment to eight nations in the Caribbean region. The ship is scheduled to arrive in Haiti later this week.

Large amphibious ships, like Iwo Jima, resemble small aircraft carriers and include the ability to support helicopter and landing craft operations to quickly move personnel and cargo, making it an ideal platform to support humanitarian-relief missions on short notice.

A crew of 1,600 military and civilian medical, engineering, aviation, logistical and other support personnel are embarked aboard Iwo Jima, including U.S. Navy engineers, a contingent of 500 Marines with logistical-support expertise, volunteers from the U.S. Public Health Service and various non-governmental organizations (NGOs), as well as medical, dental and engineering professionals from Europe, North America and South America.

Eight CH-46 Sea Knight, medium-lift, dual-rotor helicopters; two MH-60 Knight Hawk helicopters and two amphibious landing craft units (LCU's) are on Iwo Jima to support the ship's operations.

Iwo Jima is a Wasp-class amphibious ship capable of speeds in excess of 20 knots that can provide robust ship-to-shore, as well as shore-to-shore logistics support during contingencies ranging from traditional military operations to humanitarian and disaster-relief missions.

Because of the Caribbean region's history of severe-weather events during the peak months of the hurricane season, the ship has remained in the area throughout its present deployment, ready to support U.S. disaster relief efforts when directed.

Iwo Jima was in Port-de-Paix, Haiti, from July 24 through Aug. 3. It was the first stop on CP10 and the crew provided medical assistance to more than 4,000 Haitian citizens, performed 32 surgeries, completed six engineering projects, and delivered 231 pallets of humanitarian-assistance supplies donated by NGOs.

In September 2008, the amphibious ship USS Kearsarge deployed to Haiti

MUSCAT (AP) - Oman's foreign minister says he's not aware of any current plans for Iran to release two other Americans still being held there but that his country is willing to act as an intermediary between Tehran and Washington. Oman played a key role in helping mediate the release of American Sarah Shourd from Iran. Two other Americans with whom she was arrested last year are still being held in Tehran on espionage charges. Oman's foreign minister, Yusuf bin Alawai bin Abdullah, said by phone that there are "great possibilities" in repairing relations between the United States and Iran. To help restore ties, he urged American officials to tone down what is seen as harsh rhetoric directed at Iran.

Subject: Update on PSA

Wanted to update you all on the PSA and where things stand. The Ad Council placed the PSA on Wednesday.

Overall, based on the MNR report, our estimated online audience for the PSA launch story was 5.4 million, including stories on Yahoo Finance, Forbes, and CNN. For just over 24 hours since the MNR distribution, this is fantastic pickup per the Ad Council.

The Ad Council will continue to push this out domestically and giving us updates on where it is. They are targeting large sporting events like U.S Open, etc. If you would like the full report with specific stories, I can send separately however because the file is so large I do not want to max out everyone's inboxes.

On the International side and specifically S interest in placing with Al Jazeera, the Ad Council did a slightly modified version of the 30 sec PSA, removing the texting information on the final screen and is overnighting the tape to the State Department today. Once we have that (timing for Tuesday), we will work with Dana and PA to have the PSA placed accordingly where makes sense.

Larry has already said that local stations in Pakistan liked the ad and were using it/reporting on it. As he is obviously very busy, hard to know more beyond this point. IIP has been great and the revised ad is going up on America.gov. Will work them to see what other embassy sites, etc we can promote this with.

We will continue to work to place the ad and will have donation reports on Tuesday that hopefully will reflect monetary upticks as well. Let me know if you have any questions. Best, Katie

READOUT OF MEETING AT Al Gezira Club WITH HIS CHILDREN
On October 8, 2010 went to the Al Gezira club to see his children as per the court ordered visitation dated June 30, 2010, which stipulated twice monthly visits on alternate Fridays. This was the first such visit to take place. The visit was scheduled for 12:00 p.m. and ACS Chief arrived at 11:55 a.m. checked in with the security office at the club and then waited at the playground for the children. At approximately 1:20 p.m., arrived with the children, her two brothers, and a cousin. There was a discernible State Security presence throughout the visit.

At one point, the ACS Chief received a duty call and stepped 20 feet away from the group to handle the call.

Dear Boss,
Still working it down the last day.
We got the Amb some good photo ops in the flood zone...
Larry

"A Bag of Flour," an op-ed by Javed Chaudhry in liberal Urdu daily "Express" (cir. 25,000) (11/02)

"... It was the picture of a U.S. helicopter parked at a helipad in Sukkur. Many people clad in military uniforms were unloading the relief goods for flood-affected people in the Sindh province. A middle-aged American national, wearing a shirt and grey pants and carrying a 40-kg flour bag, immediately caught my attention. It took me hardly a few seconds to recognize him. He was no other than the new U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan, Mr. Cameron Munter. During my recent visit to the United States, I had the chance to meet him at the residence of our Ambassador in Washington, Mr. Hussain Haqqani. In a lighter vein, he (Ambassador Munter) asked me and other Pakistani journalists, present on the occasion, that 'please don't pester me during my stay in Pakistan because I am very scared of the Pakistani media even now in my own country.' These words garnered a resounding laughter from all of us. It was my first meeting with Ambassador Munter. Now he is in Pakistan where the U.S. Ambassador is always more busy even than the host country's president. Within a week after his arrival in Pakistan, the U.S. Ambassador reached Sukkur along with relief goods for the flood-affected people who are still languishing in makeshift tents. To the much astonishment of common Pakistanis, he, along with other ordinary officials, started unloading the relief goods with his own hands, and all major newspapers of the country gave front-page coverage to this picture. This photo conveyed two messages to us: first, the great nations also have great traditions, and second, relatively small nations, like us, possess low status because our leaders are totally devoid of such humbleness. The U.S. ambassadors virtually enjoy the viceregal status in third world countries, but despite enjoying such kingly powers they adopt very humble attitude towards other people. They treat even the attendants, drivers, and other employees in their personal staff as human beings. And whenever some natural disaster visits the populations of the host countries, the U.S. ambassadors in those states rush to help the devastated people. Ambassador Cameron Munter could also have behaved like our rulers and distribute relief goods among affected people while himself dressed in precious costumes... Even if his attitude was part of the U.S. propaganda, why our rulers cannot display such ostentations for the welfare of their subjects? The second message this picture conveyed is that we Pakistanis lack humbleness. For our politicians, the ordinary people are nothing more than votes who catapult them into the corridors of power. On the other hand, after winning the elections, American politicians live among their people. They travel side by side with the common man in public transport and shake hands with them in ordinary restaurants. This picture says that until Prime Minister Gilani picks up a flour bag on his shoulders and carries it to a common Pakistani, he cannot change the destiny of this nation."

BERKELEY (AP) - The aunt of an American woman released from an Iranian prison says her niece plans to hold a news conference in New York. Sarah Shourd's aunt, Karen Sandys (san-dees), told The Associated Press on September 17 that Shourd and her mother will travel September 18 from Oman to New York. Sandys says the news conference is planned for September 19, when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will be in New York for the UN General Assembly. Sandys says her niece is focused on securing the freedom of her friends, Josh Fattal and Shane Bauer.

Americans Most Likely to Favor GOP Newcomers for Congress

Three in four believe influx of new members would improve Congress

by Jeffrey M. Jones
PRINCETON, NJ -- It appears that the best type of candidate to be this fall is a Republican challenger. Given a choice of four hypothetical candidates of differing party affiliations and experience, Americans are most likely to prefer "a Republican who has not served in Congress." Those who would prefer a Democratic candidate opt for an incumbent over a newcomer.

These results, based on an Aug. 27-30 USA Today/Gallup poll, underscore the advantageous political environment for Republicans and non-incumbents this midterm election season. Overall, a majority of Americans prefer a Republican candidate (regardless of experience) to a Democrat, 53% to 40%. And a majority also prefer a non-incumbent (regardless of party affiliation) to an incumbent, 54% to 39%.
The fact that Americans who prefer a Republican candidate want one who is new to Congress suggests that these voters want both GOP control of Congress and the new perspectives that come from members with no prior Washington experience. Americans who favor Democratic candidates, on the other hand, apparently are more satisfied with the type of experienced representatives now in Congress.
One would naturally expect Democrats to prefer Democratic candidates, and Republicans to prefer Republican candidates, and that is the case when looking at the data by party. But partisans' preferences for incumbents versus challengers seem to be influenced by their knowledge that the Democrats currently have a majority in Congress, and thus, more Democrats will be defending House seats this fall. Democrats are more likely to prefer a Democrat who is in Congress to a Democrat who is not, and Republicans are more likely to prefer a Republican outside of Congress to one who is currently serving there. Independents also show a strong preference for Republican non-incumbents.

The data do not necessarily indicate how Americans would vote in the fall when presented with a choice of two specific candidates for Congress. This fall, voters will generally be asked to choose between one Republican and one Democratic candidate, one of whom may be an incumbent. When asked in the same poll whether they are more likely to vote for the Republican or the Democratic congressional candidate in their district if the elections were held today, 48% of Americans say the Republican and 43% the Democrat.

The appeal of non-incumbents is apparent in another question in the poll that finds 75% of Americans saying Congress would be changed for the better if "most of the present members of Congress are replaced with new members." Only 14% think that would make Congress worse. This is consistent with Gallup's findings from earlier this year suggesting strong anti-incumbent sentiment.

Americans across key demographic subgroups widely share the belief that Congress would be improved if most members were turned out of office. However, there is a significant gap by political party, with 89% of Republicans versus 63% of Democrats saying that replacing most members of Congress would be beneficial. Again, the difference likely stems from Democrats' current status as the majority party in Congress.

Implications

In a year when Americans are dissatisfied with the state of the nation and give relatively low ratings to the president and Congress, it is not politically beneficial to be either an incumbent or a member of the ruling party. That is reflected in Americans' preference for a Republican newcomer over other types of candidates they may have a chance to vote for in this fall's midterm congressional elections. It is also reflected in prior analysis of historical Gallup data showing greater seat turnover in Congress when the president and Congress are unpopular.

Joining the conversation

BY KATE HEARTFIELD, THE OTTAWA CITIZENAUGUST 19, 2010

Ottawa Citizen

The U.S. Department of State has made it very clear: The security of information on BlackBerrys is not just about economics.

It's also, in the words of spokesman P. J. Crowley, "about what we think is an important element of democracy, human rights and freedom of information ... You should be opening up societies to these new technologies that have the opportunity to empower people ..."

Canada's government has made, at least in public, no such link between BlackBerrys and democratization. It has not spoken about the potential for authoritarian governments to abuse monitoring privileges. It has decided the demands placed on Canadian company Research in Motion by the governments of Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and India add up to a business story, not a foreign-affairs story.

This is just one example of a larger political failure in Canada to appreciate the full foreign-policy potential of communication technology.

In the United States, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has called for a "21st-century statecraft" that harnesses tools such as Twitter and text messages.

Articles this summer in The New York Times Magazine and Foreign Policy have called it "digital diplomacy." Some, such as Canadian diplomacy expert Daryl Copeland, call it "e-diplomacy."

In 2010, the world sees Canada through YouTube.

"Diplomacy in the international arena is no longer about the big-D diplomat charging in on his white horse and expounding the virtues of Canada at cocktail parties," says Shauna Sylvester, who was the director of Canada's World, a three-year non-governmental project consulting citizens about foreign policy.

The United Kingdom's Digital Diplomacy web portal (yes, it has one) defines digital diplomacy as "solving foreign policy problems using the Internet." Social-media enthusiasts often talk about the wisdom of crowds; post a problem on the Internet today, and someone, somewhere, will post a solution tomorrow.

No one's likely to craft peace in the Middle East by creating a Facebook page. But Facebook pages, and other social media, can shift global public opinion in new directions. That, in turn, affects Canada's tourism, trade, security, immigration.

Canada's government has done some important work in digital diplomacy. "Canada was a pioneer in this field," says Copeland.

In 2003, for example, Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham solicited online comments about policy questions.

In 2005, the government created a virtual network called Connect2Canada.com "for friends of Canada and Canadians in the United States." It's still going strong and is a good example of 21st-century government communication, including an "ask the ambassador" link and a YouTube channel.

More recently, the government created an impressive, if unwieldy, interactive site for the G20 summit. It is also actively "correcting misinformation" in social media when it comes to the seal hunt.

But Sylvester says the enthusiasm for open government seemed to fade after the Conservatives took office in 2006. "Engagement was no longer part of the government's role."

There are people who get it in the public service today, and some very good initiatives. There are even a few ministers who get Twitter. But there is no Hillary Clinton pushing the government to do better, no office of digital diplomacy working on a strategy.

How we do it is almost as important as whether we do it at all. The tactic the government has taken on the seal hunt, for example, could have the intended effect of countering inaccuracy, or it could come across as a heavy-handed attempt to control the debate, especially if the government's not simultaneously engaged in more crowd-pleasing ways to get its message across. Some governments have had fun with social media, opening virtual embassies on Second Life, for example.

Wikipedia edits are another tricky area. As for seeding Twitter and the blogosphere with Canadian values, it has to be done with care. Security analyst Peter Jones points out that if, for example, an Iranian blogger becomes too closely associated with the West, his or her credibility could suffer.

The field of digital diplomacy is new, and fraught with risks. The opportunities, though, are exciting.

In that New York Times Magazine article, Alec Ross, Clinton's senior adviser for innovation, said the key question for 21st-century statecraft is "Is it open or is it closed?" That's a sensitive question for this Conservative government.

A real advance in e-diplomacy, a real engagement in the split-second, wide-open, on-the-record world of Twitter and Wikipedia, requires a prime minister who is willing to let public servants and diplomats have a constant unmediated conversation with the public. It means relinquishing central control of the message.

The alternative is to fade into irrelevance. Because that big, messy, whirlwind global conversation's going to happen anyway, whether Canada's part of it or not.

The cross-border rocket fire was the first since Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met in Washington to relaunch peace negotiations.

The $2 billion appeal announced on September 17 for Pakistan relief includes the nearly $500 million the UN asked countries and organizations to donate shortly after the onset of massive flooding nearly two months ago.

Subject: For the CFR speech: A New American Century

I read the Roger Cohen piece and agree that it is v smart. And I've been thinking about the need for a headline/bumper sticker for the speech. How about "A New American Century"? We cd take on the critics directly and right up front and make the argument this way (a lot of this is already in the intro, but wd need to be pulled together differently).

1) We live in a new age of diplomacy - we are seeing the limits of force and we face collective problems that require bringing together a wider array of key players rather than any one nation dictating a solution. Active diplomacy is the only option. (This is the argument david rothkopf was making to mark landler when we thought landler was doing a profile - it resonated v well w/ landler.)

2) The U.S. is uniquely suited to lead in these circumstances. a) In situations where many nations must be brought together that do not trust each other, we are still seen as the most honest broker. b) In situations where many nations are sitting around the table contemplating a common problem, someone has to step forward and take responsibility for mobilizing action (which also includes the risk of failure). We are the nation most willing to do that, both because of our history and our values. (Here is where S can offer personal anecdotes re nations waiting for us to do something) c) in a world of global problems, we are the most global nation, with the greatest global reach, resources, and connections.

3) We see global leadership not only as a responsibility but also as an opportunity, b/c of our native confidence, optimism and faith that problems can be solved. We have a chance to shape a genuinely global agenda, focusing on development as well as traditional national security issues, and mobilizing business and civil society as well as governments. This is our time.

The speech would then go on, as it does now, to outline all the ways in which we are building relationships and solving problems now with traditional allies and new powers on the global landscape while building a longer term architecture of cooperation that is both truly global and adapted to solving 21st century problems.

Apparently Secretary Clinton got Mubarak's agreement to release the boys. The father is headed to Cairo on Monday to pick them up at the embassy. Staff at the embassy and at the State Dept is now saying that this is only a visitation. As you can imagine the family is really upset and the supporters are livid. They are expecting that Colin will be headed back to the states with the boys Tuesday. The press wants to know what is going on. Any advice here, because I have no idea what is going on? The Secretary did such a mitzvah by recording a video message for us encouraging American families to host exchange students. In a few short days the video has had a tremendous impact. We have heard from so many people who work to recruit host families about what a major effect the video will have on their efforts. One person even described showing the video on her mobile phone to someone who then agreed on the spot to host an exchange student for the first time. In addition to the anecdotal stories we are hearing, the video has had almost 6,500 views on our YouTube page, which is unheard of for an ECA-related video—especially one that's only been up 2 days!

Recruiting host families and schools is a continual challenge, and is it imperative to the success of our programs so we are so grateful for her contribution. This little bit will go a very long way. Please pass on our appreciation to her.

Hi Betsy,

I thought you might appreciate knowing that within the first hour of the video release by the State Department featuring Secretary Clinton we found a host family! I appreciate the endorsement and recognition from the top at the State Department for the incredible contributions American families make to youth exchange programs.

I am sharing the message below that we sent this afternoon to our thousands of host families, volunteers and alumni.

Kind regards,

Subject line: Secretary Clinton, my physical therapist's office, and YFU...

Dear fellow YFU'ers,

Earlier this week I was in my physical therapist's office filling out volumes of paperwork. I happened to be wearing my YFU polo shirt, and the receptionist asked what Youth For Understanding was all about. While I was telling her, my Palm beeped that I had a new message – it happened to be an email produced by the State Department of Secretary Clinton's endorsement of hosting and international exchange. I opened the email and clicked on the link. The two receptionists, a nurse and I huddled around my phone and watched Clinton speak to the importance of global exchange.

Luckily, I had saved several student profiles in my phone and was able to show the receptionists some of the unplaced students right then and there. I am not sure whether it was the video or the profiles but once I told her my own YFU story, one of the receptionists was hooked. She already has a student picked out, and her host family application is being completed today! It feels wonderful to change the life of a teenager thousands of miles away and a newfound friend in my own backyard.

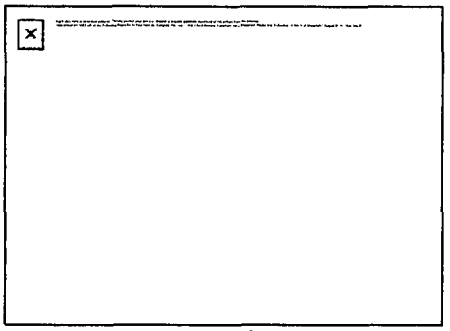
Americans Give GOP Edge on Most Election Issues

Greatest Republican advantages on terrorism, immigration, federal spending

by Jeffrey M. Jones

PRINCETON, NJ -- A new USA Today/Gallup poll finds Americans saying the Republicans in Congress would do a better job than the Democrats in Congress of handling seven of nine key election issues. The parties are essentially tied on healthcare, with the environment being the lone Democratic strength.



The Republicans' advantage on most issues is an indication of the currently favorable political environment for the party. Of particular note is the parity between the two parties on healthcare, an issue on which Americans historically have viewed the Democrats as superior.

A similar USA Today/Gallup poll conducted in October 2006, just prior to Democrats' major gains in that fall's elections, highlights the potential implications of these findings. That poll, which includes several issues measured in the current survey, found the Democrats leading on all eight issues tested at that time, including some usual Republican strengths like terrorism and moral values.

With Republicans now having the advantage on most issues, the party may be poised to make major gains in congressional seats, just as the Democrats did in 2006. Indeed, Gallup tracking of registered voters' preferences in the 2010 generic ballot for Congress continues to find the Republicans ahead of the Democrats, as it has for the past five weeks.

The Economy Matters Most

The Democrats' advantage on the issue of the environment is likely not something the party can leverage to improve its 2010 electoral fortunes, as Americans rank it at the bottom of the list in terms of its importance to their vote. Rather, economic concerns are paramount, with a majority of Americans rating the economy, jobs, and federal spending (along with government corruption) as extremely important.

The Republican advantages on these economic matters range from a low of +5 on jobs to a high of +15 on federal spending. Terrorism -- the issue on which Republicans have the greatest advantage over Democrats -- is rated as very important by 47% of Americans, putting it in the middle of the list.

Bottom Line

Republicans' perceptual advantage on most key election issues reinforces the party's advantageous positioning heading into the stretch run of the 2010 election campaign. It is not clear whether Americans give the Republicans the edge on these issues because they have confidence in the GOP to make progress in addressing the major problems facing the country, or whether the ratings have more to do with the public's frustration with the incumbent Democratic Party's performance to date.

The Democrats' hopes for improving their fortunes may hinge on convincing voters they have superior plans for jump-starting the economy, the issue of uppermost importance in Americans' minds. That could be tough to do when, after nearly 20 months of Democratic leadership in Congress and the White House, Americans' opinions of the economy remain negative and have become more pessimistic in recent weeks.

Clinton's aim is true as Democrats' top gun

By Edward Luce in Washington
Published: October 12 2010 20:43 | Last updated: October 12 2010 20:43

Nobody would go so far as to call it a comeback. But Bill Clinton's appearances on the midterm election trail are starting to turn voters' heads in a way that Barack Obama's simply are not.

Democratic operatives say that Mr Clinton, who went through in 1994 the kind of setback that pollsters say Mr Obama will face in less than three weeks, is more effective at presenting the election as a choice between starkly different alternatives rather than a referendum on what people think of the Obama administration.

So far the president, who has booked most of the next three weeks for campaigning, has been unable to pull that off. This week alone, Mr Clinton has shaken up two Senate races – in Kentucky and West Virginia – with appearances that have assisted Democratic candidates. Mr Clinton was due to speak in Las Vegas on Tuesday night to assist the embattled Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, and then move onto California later in the week.

"Bill Clinton is about as close to a secret weapon as the Democratic party has got," says Norm Ornstein, a political analyst at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "He has this ability to fire up the Democratic base that almost nobody else can do right now." Mr Clinton's intervention in Kentucky, where Jack Conway, the Democratic candidate, is locked in a tight race with Rand Paul, the Tea Party icon, is a good case in point.

At the weekend Mr Clinton described Mr Paul, who wants drastically to shrink the size of the US federal government and has talked of abolishing the Federal Reserve, as a "radical with no record to back it up". Mr Paul, who has never run for elected office, hit back by reminding voters of Mr Clinton's former Monica Lewinsky scandal. "I am not sure I would trust a man who had sex with an intern," said Mr Paul. "I mean, do you think he's an honourable person?"

Mr Paul's trip down memory lane appears to have backfired. Few voters seem to care any longer about a scandal that occurred amid what in retrospect looks like a golden age of balanced budgets, job creation and the absence of foreign wars.

"Bill Clinton's strength is that he knows how to fight back and turn adversity into advantage," says Tad Devine, a veteran Democratic operative. "He is also able to enter an individual race, take the temperature, understand what people are feeling and then base his appeal to voters on that."

In the West Virginia Senate race, where Joe Manchin, the governor, is trailing John Raese, a wealthy local businessman, Mr Clinton on Monday came out punching. Referring to Mr Raese's plush Florida vacation home, the former president said: "I'm here for a lot of reasons. One is that I don't think it's fair for West Virginia to have one senator and Florida to have three."

Acknowledging voter anger in a state where Mr Obama has 29 per cent rating, among the lowest in the country, Mr Clinton added: 'I am old enough to know that if you make a decision when you are mad – and I am not just talking about politics here – there is about an 80 per cent chance you will make a mistake."

In contrast, a lot of Democrats are critical of the way Mr Obama has framed the midterm campaign, shifting from one attack line to another without sticking to an overarching narrative. Last month, Mr Obama turned on John Boehner, the Republican congressional leader, in what looked like a move to depict him as the voters' alternative.

More recently, Mr Obama has switched to attacking the Chamber of Commerce for allegedly funnelling foreign money into attack ads. But it has generated a lot of criticism. "This election is awash with undisclosed money and it's fair to point out how disadvantaged the Democrats have been," says one consultant. "But it isn't good politics at this late stage when voters clearly want to hear about the economy."

AMMAN (Reuters) - Jordanian King Abdullah has accepted an invitation by the United States to attend the launch of direct talks between Israelis and Palestinians that aim to forge a peace deal within 12 months, the state news agency said. The statement on the Petra news agency on August 21 said King Abdullah would hold a bilateral meeting with Obama. "The talks...will revolve around the steps necessary to be taken to ensure the negotiations reach their aim in ending the Palestinian-Israeli conflict on the basis of a two-state solution," the statement said.

This is the custody case Dean emailed you about and John Kerry called me to discuss. I personally gave a letter to Mubarak and asked that the children be returned to their father in the US, or, at the least, be given court ordered visits. I don't know what, if anything, then happened.

I'm copying Jeff Feltman on this and asking him to have someone follow up w Dean and Kerry and to let us both know what's happening.

Apparently Secretary Clinton got Mubarak's agreement to release the boys. The father is headed to Cairo on Monday to pick them up at the embassy. Staff at the embassy and at the State Dept is now saying that this is only a visitation. As you can imagine the family is really upset and the supporters are livid. They are expecting that Colin will be headed back to the states with the boys Tuesday. The press wants to know what is going on. Any advice here, because I have no idea what is going on? Many thanks to you and esp to Hillary for getting us this far. Howard

The Education of a President

These days, Obama has been seeking guidance in presidential biographies. He is reading, among others, "The Clinton Tapes," Taylor Branch's account of his secret interviews with Bill Clinton during the eight years of his presidency. "I was looking over some chronicles of the Clinton years," Obama told me, "and was reminded that in '94 — when President Clinton's poll numbers were lower than mine, and obviously the election ended up being bad for Democrats — unemployment was only 6.6 percent. And I don't think anybody would suggest that Bill Clinton wasn't a good communicator or was somebody who couldn't connect with the American people or didn't show empathy."

In the fall of 1994, things were even better than Obama recalls: unemployment was in fact 5.6 percent. If the feel-your-pain president had trouble when the economy was not nearly as bad as it is now, with 9.6 percent unemployment, then maybe the issue for Obama is not that he is too cool or detached, as some pundits say. When the economy is bad, even the most talented of presidents suffer at the polls. "There is an anti-establishment mood," Rahm Emanuel, the former Clinton aide who served as Obama's first White House chief of staff, told me before he stepped down this month. "We just happen to be here when the music is stopping."

It would be bad form for the president to anticipate an election result before it happens, but clearly Obama hopes that just as Clinton recovered from his party's midterm shellacking in 1994 to win re-election two years later, so can he. There was something odd in hearing Obama invoke Clinton. Two years ago, Obama scorned the 42nd president, deriding the small-ball politics and triangulation maneuvers and comparing him unfavorably with Ronald Reagan. Running against Clinton's wife, Obama was the anti-Clinton. Now he hopes, in a way, to be the second coming of Bill Clinton. Because, in the end, it's better than being Jimmy Carter.

So it is a high priority for Obama to prevent any intraparty fight in 2012, and to date, despite the fire from the left, no serious challenger appears on the horizon. Putting Hillary Clinton in the cabinet may turn out to be one of Obama's smartest moves, because it not only eliminated her as a would-be challenger, but it also should presumably squelch the will-she-or-won't-she speculation that otherwise would have played out for months. (Instead, the guessing game has her replacing Biden on the ticket, however fanciful that might be.)

The Education of a President

By PETER BAKER

On a busy afternoon in the West Wing late last month, President Barack Obama seemed relaxed and unhurried as he sat down in a newly reupholstered brown leather chair in the Oval Office. He had just returned from the East Room, where he signed the Small Business Jobs Act of 2010 — using eight pens so he could give away as many as possible. The act will be his administration's last piece of significant economic legislation before voters deliver their verdict on his first two years in office. For all intents and purposes, the first chapter of Obama's presidency has ended. On Election Day, the next chapter will begin.

As he welcomed me, I told him I liked what he had done with the place. Gone was George W. Bush's yellow sunburst carpet (it says "optimistic person," Bush would tell practically anyone who visited), and in its place was a much-derided earth-tone rug with inspirational quotations. The curved walls now had striped tan wallpaper, and the coffee table had been replaced by a walnut-and-mica table that, Obama noted, would resist stains from water glasses. The bust of Winston Churchill was replaced by one of Martin Luther King Jr. The couches were new. He told me he was happy with the redecorating of the office. "I know Arianna doesn't like it," he said lightly. "But I like taupe."

If there was something incongruous about the president of the United States checking out reviews of his décor by Arianna Huffington, well, let's face it, he has endured worse reviews lately. The president who muscled through Congress perhaps the most ambitious domestic agenda in a generation finds himself vilified by the right, castigated by the left and abandoned by the middle. He heads into the final stretch of the midterm campaign season facing likely repudiation, with voters preparing to give him a Congress that, even if Democrats maintain control, will almost certainly be less friendly to the president than the one he has spent the last two years mud wrestling.

While proud of his record, Obama has already begun thinking about what went wrong — and what he needs to do to change course for the next two years. He has spent what one aide called "a lot of time talking about Obama 2.0" with his new interim chief of staff, Pete Rouse, and his deputy chief of staff, Jim Messina. During our hour together, Obama told me he had no regrets about the broad direction of his presidency. But he did identify what he called "tactical lessons." He let himself look too much like "the same old tax-and-spend liberal Democrat." He realized too late that "there's no such thing as shovel-ready projects" when it comes to public works. Perhaps he should not have proposed tax breaks as part of his stimulus and instead "let the Republicans insist on the tax cuts" so it could be seen as a bipartisan compromise.

Most of all, he has learned that, for all his anti-Washington rhetoric, he has to play by Washington rules if he wants to win in Washington. It is not enough to be supremely sure that he is right if no one else agrees with him. "Given how much stuff was coming at us," Obama told me, "we probably spent much more time trying to get the policy right than trying to get the politics right. There is probably a perverse pride in my administration — and I take responsibility for this; this was blowing from the top — that we were going to do the right thing, even if short-term it was unpopular. And I think anybody who's occupied this office has to remember that success is determined by an intersection in policy and politics and that you can't be neglecting of marketing and P.R. and public opinion."

That presumes that what he did was the right thing, a matter of considerable debate. The left thinks he did too little; the right too much. But what is striking about Obama's self-diagnosis is that by his own rendering, the figure of inspiration from 2008 neglected the inspiration after his election. He didn't stay connected to the people who put him in office in the first place. Instead, he simultaneously disappointed those who considered him the embodiment of a new progressive movement and those who expected him to reach across the aisle to usher in a postpartisan age. On the campaign trail lately, Obama has been confronted by disillusionment — the woman who was "exhausted" defending him, the mother whose son campaigned for him but was now looking for work. Even Shepard Fairey, the artist who made the iconic multihued "Hope" poster, says he's losing hope.

Perhaps that should have come as no surprise. When Obama secured the Democratic nomination in June 2008, he told an admiring crowd that someday "we will be able to look back and tell our children that this was the moment when we began to provide care for the sick and good jobs to the jobless; this was the moment when the rise of the oceans began to slow and our planet began to heal; this was the moment when we ended a war and secured our nation and restored our image as the last, best hope on earth."

I read that line to Obama and asked how his high-flying rhetoric sounded in these days of low-flying governance. "It sounds ambitious," he agreed. "But you know what? We've made progress on each of those fronts." He quoted Mario Cuomo's line about campaigning in poetry and governing in prose. "But the prose and the poetry match up," he said. "It would be very hard for people to look back and say, You know what, Obama didn't do what he's promised. I think they could say, On a bunch of fronts he still has an incomplete. But I keep a checklist of what we committed to doing, and we've probably accomplished 70 percent of the things that we talked about during the campaign. And I hope as long as I'm president, I've got a chance to work on the other 30 percent."

But save the planet? If you promise to save the planet, might people think you would, you know, actually save the planet? He laughed, before shifting back to hope and inspiration. "I make no apologies for having set high expectations for myself and for the country, because I think we can meet those expectations," he said. "Now, the one thing that I will say — which I anticipated and can be tough — is the fact that in a big, messy democracy like this, everything takes time. And we're not a culture that's built on patience."

These days, Obama has been seeking guidance in presidential biographies. He is reading, among others, "The Clinton Tapes," Taylor Branch's account of his secret interviews with Bill Clinton during the eight years of his presidency. "I was looking over some chronicles of the Clinton years," Obama told me, "and was reminded that in '94 — when President Clinton's poll numbers were lower than mine, and obviously the election ended up being bad for Democrats — unemployment was only 6.6 percent. And I don't think anybody would suggest that Bill Clinton wasn't a good communicator or was somebody who couldn't connect with the American people or didn't show empathy."

In the fall of 1994, things were even better than Obama recalls: unemployment was in fact 5.6 percent. If the feel-your-pain president had trouble when the economy was not nearly as bad as it is now, with 9.6 percent unemployment, then maybe the issue for Obama is not that he is too cool or detached, as some pundits say. When the economy is bad, even the most talented of presidents suffer at the polls. "There is an anti-establishment mood," Rahm Emanuel, the former Clinton aide who served as Obama's first White House chief of staff, told me before he stepped down this month. "We just happen to be here when the music is stopping."

It would be bad form for the president to anticipate an election result before it happens, but clearly Obama hopes that just as Clinton recovered from his party's midterm shellacking in 1994 to win re-election two years later, so can he. There was something odd in hearing Obama invoke Clinton. Two years ago, Obama scorned the 42nd president, deriding the small-ball politics and triangulation maneuvers and comparing him unfavorably with Ronald Reagan. Running against Clinton's wife, Obama was the anti-Clinton. Now he hopes, in a way, to be the second coming of Bill Clinton. Because, in the end, it's better than being Jimmy Carter.

Last month, I made my way through the West Wing talking not only with Obama but also with nearly two dozen of his advisers — some of whom spoke with permission, others without — hoping to understand how the situation looks to them. The view from inside the administration starts with a basic mantra: Obama inherited the worst problems of any president in years. Or in generations. Or in American history. He prevented another Great Depression while putting in place the foundation for a more stable future. But it required him to do unpopular things that would inevitably cost him.

"He got here, and the expectations for what he could accomplish were very high and probably unrealistic," Pete Rouse told me. Indeed, David Axelrod and David Plouffe, the masterminds of the 2008 presidential campaign, said they cautioned Obama after his victory to brace himself for a precipitous drop in his popularity given the severity of his challenges. "I told him at some point that at the end of '10, his approval rating could be low- to mid-30s," Plouffe told me.

Yet even if the White House saw it coming, this is an administration that feels shellshocked. Many officials worry, they say, that the best days of the Obama presidency are behind them. They talk about whether it is time to move on. While not in the 30s, Obama's approval rating in surveys conducted by The New York Times and CBS News had fallen to 45 percent last month from 62 percent when he took office — just a point above where Clinton was before losing Congress in 1994 and three points above where Reagan was before the Republicans lost a couple dozen House seats in 1982. Joel Benenson, Obama's pollster, pointed out that even at 45 percent, the president's popularity eclipses that of Congress, the news media, the banks and other forces in American life. "We are in a time when the American public is highly suspect of any institution," he said, "and President Obama still stands above that." Obama's team takes pride that he has fulfilled three of the five major promises he laid out as pillars of his "new foundation" in an April 2009 speech at Georgetown University — health care, education reform and financial reregulation. And they point to decisions to end the combat mission in Iraq while escalating the war in Afghanistan. "History will judge Obama that the first two years were very productive," Rouse says.

But it is possible to win the inside game and lose the outside game. In their darkest moments, White House aides wonder aloud whether it is even possible for a modern president to succeed, no matter how many bills he signs. Everything seems to conspire against the idea: an implacable opposition with little if any real interest in collaboration, a news media saturated with triviality and conflict, a culture that demands solutions yesterday, a societal cynicism that holds leadership in low regard. Some White House aides who were ready to carve a new spot on Mount Rushmore for their boss two years ago privately concede now that he cannot be another Abraham Lincoln after all. In this environment, they have increasingly concluded, it may be that every modern president is going to be, at best, average.

"We're all a lot more cynical now," one aide told me. The easy answer is to blame the Republicans, and White House aides do that with exuberance. But they are also looking at their own misjudgments, the hubris that led them to think they really could defy the laws of politics. "It's not that we believed our own press or press releases, but there was definitely a sense at the beginning that we could really change Washington," another White House official told me. " 'Arrogance' isn't the right word, but we were overconfident."

The biggest miscalculation in the minds of most Obama advisers was the assumption that he could bridge a polarized capital and forge genuinely bipartisan coalitions. While Republican leaders resolved to stand against Obama, his early efforts to woo the opposition also struck many as halfhearted. "If anybody thought the Republicans were just going to roll over, we were just terribly mistaken," former Senator Tom Daschle, a mentor and an outside adviser to Obama, told me. "I'm not sure anybody really thought that, but I think we kind of hoped the Republicans would go away. And obviously they didn't do that."

Senator Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the upper chamber and Obama's ally from Illinois, said the Republicans were to blame for the absence of bipartisanship. "I think his fate was sealed," Durbin said. "Once the Republicans decided they would close ranks to defeat him, that just made it extremely difficult and dragged it out for a longer period of time. The American people have a limited attention span. Once you convince them there's a problem, they want a solution."

Gov. Ed Rendell of Pennsylvania, though, is among the Democrats who grade Obama harshly for not being more nimble in the face of opposition. "B-plus, A-minus on substantive accomplishments," he told me, "and a D-plus or C-minus on communication." The health care legislation is "an incredible achievement" and the stimulus program was "absolutely, unqualifiedly, enormously successful," in Rendell's judgment, yet Obama allowed them to be tarnished by critics. "They lost the communications battle on both major initiatives, and they lost it early," said Rendell, an ardent Hillary Clinton backer who later became an Obama supporter. "We didn't use the president in either stimulus or health care until we had lost the spin battle."

That's a refrain heard inside the White House as well: it's a communication problem. The first refuge of any politician in trouble is that it's a communication problem, not a policy problem. If only I explained what I was doing better, the people would be more supportive. Which roughly translates to If only you people paid attention, you wouldn't be kicking me upside the head. Robert Gibbs, the White House press secretary, laughed at the ever-ready assumption that all problems stem from poor communication. "I haven't been at a policy-problem meeting in 20 months," he noted.

The policy criticism of Obama can be confusing and deeply contradictory — he is a liberal zealot, in the view of the right; a weak accommodationist, in the view of the left. He is an anticapitalist socialist who is too cozy with Wall Street, a weak-on-defense apologist for America who adopted Bush's unrelenting antiterror tactics at the expense of civil liberties.

"When he talked about being a transformational president, it was about restoring the faith of the American people in our governing institutions," says Ken Duberstein, the former Reagan White House chief of staff who voted for Obama in 2008. "What we now know is that that did not work. If anything, people are even more dubious about all of our institutions, especially government. So to that extent, the transformational side has not worked. And frankly I would settle these days — forget about transformational, how about a transactional president, somebody people could do business with? It seems there's an ideological rigidity that the American people did not sense."

The other side would like more ideological rigidity. Norman Solomon, a leading progressive activist and the president of the Institute for Public Accuracy, said Obama has "totally blown this great opportunity" to reinvent America by being more aggressive on issues like a public health care option. Other liberals feel the same way about gays in the military or the prison at Guántanamo Bay. "It's been so reflexive since he was elected, to just give ground and give ground," Solomon told me. "If we don't call him a wimp, which may be the wrong word, he just seems to be backpedaling." Solomon added: "It makes people feel angry and perhaps used. People just feel like, Gee, we really believed in this guy, and his rhetoric is so different than the way he's behaved in office."

Pummeled from both sides, Obama clearly seems frustrated and, at times, defensive. At a Labor Day event in Milwaukee, he complained that the special interests treat him badly. "They're not always happy with me," he told supporters. "They talk about me like a dog — that's not in my prepared remarks, but it's true."

The friendly fire may bother him even more. "Democrats just congenitally tend to see the glass as half empty," Obama said at a fund-raiser in Greenwich, Conn., last month. "If we get an historic health care bill passed — oh, well, the public option wasn't there. If you get the financial reform bill passed — then, well, I don't know about this particular derivatives rule, I'm not sure that I'm satisfied with that. And, gosh, we haven't yet brought about world peace. I thought that was going to happen quicker."

Then again, it is Obama himself, and not just his supporters, who casts his presidency in grandiose terms. As he pleaded with Democrats for patience at another fund-raiser in Washington two weeks later: "It took time to free the slaves. It took time for women to get the vote. It took time for workers to get the right to organize."

One morning around the 100-day mark in Obama's administration, the president and his top aides gathered for their morning meeting in the Oval Office. As they waited for David Axelrod, who was running late, someone noted the coming milestone and asked Obama what surprised him most since taking office. "The number of people who don't pay their taxes," he answered sardonically.

From the start, Obama has been surprised by all sorts of challenges that have made it hard for him to govern — not just the big problems that he knew about, like the economy and the wars, but also the myriad little ones that hindered his progress, like one nominee after another brought down by unpaid taxes. Obama trusted his judgment and seemed to have assumed that impressive people in his own party must have a certain basic sense of integrity — and that impressive people in the other party must want to work with him.

Four of the five presidents previous to Obama were governors who came to Washington vowing to fix it, only to realize that Washington defies the easy, and often hollow, rhetoric of change. While Obama was a senator when he set off on the campaign trail, he made the same pledges and has encountered the same reality. "The story of the first two years is the inherent conflict between a guy who ran from outside to change Washington, gets here and the situation was even worse than we thought it was," a senior aide told me. "Here's a guy who ran as an outsider to change Washington who all of a sudden realized that just to deal with these issues, we were going to have to work with Washington to fix that."

Obama does little to disguise his disdain for Washington and the conventions of modern politics. When he emerges from the Oval Office during the day, aides say, he sometimes pauses before the split-screen television in the outer reception area, soaks in the cable chatter, then shakes his head and walks away. "He's still never gotten comfortable here," a top White House official told me. He has little patience for what Valerie Jarrett, a senior adviser, calls "the inevitable theatrics of Washington."

But in politics, theater matters, whether it should or not, a lesson Obama keeps relearning, however grudgingly. His decision to redecorate the Oval Office was criticized as an unnecessary luxury in a time of austerity, no matter that it was paid for by private funds. On the campaign trail, he thought it was silly to wear a flag pin, as if that were a measure of his patriotism, until his refusal to wear a flag pin generated distracting criticism and one day he showed up wearing one. Likewise, he thought it was enough to pray in private while living in the White House, and then a poll showed that most Americans weren't sure he's Christian; sure enough, a few weeks later, he attended services at St. John's Church across from Lafayette Square, photographers in tow.

Obama came to office with enormous faith in his own powers of persuasion. He seemed to believe he could overcome divisions if he just sat down with the world's most recalcitrant figures — whether they be the mullahs in Tehran or the Republicans on Capitol Hill. As it turned out, the candidate who said he would be willing to meet in his first year with some of America's enemies "without precondition" has met with none of them. And the president who in his State of the Union address this year promised to meet monthly with leaders of both parties in Congress ended up doing so just half as often.

He has yet to fully decide whether he is of Washington or apart from it. During the health care debate, Obama had Emanuel cut deals with the pharmaceutical industry, while Axelrod presented the president as above the old business as usual. "Perhaps we were naïve," Axelrod told me. "First, he's always had good relations across party lines. And secondly, I think he believed that in the midst of a crisis you could find partners on the other side of the aisle to help deal with it. I don't think anyone here expected the degree of partisanship that we confronted." Emanuel said Republicans adopted a strategy of poisoning the public well. "Part of what they were doing was not just making us grind it out," he told me. "They were souring the country on the mood of the country."

Still, Obama plays the partisan game as well. After months of quiet negotiations, some administration officials thought they were close to a package of new financial regulations with Republican support when, to their chagrin, the White House decided to use the issue to wage a high-profile and politically useful battle with Wall Street special interests. At that point, the chances for a deal across party lines collapsed, administration officials said, and Obama was left to rely almost entirely on Democratic votes.

Obama advisers who left the White House recently have been struck how different, and worse, things look from the outside. As he made a round of corporate job interviews after stepping down as White House budget director, Peter Orszag was stunned to discover how deep the gulf between the president and business had become. "I'd thought it was an 8, but it's more like a 10," he told me. "And rather than wasting time debating whether it's legitimate," he added, referring to his former colleagues, "the key is to recognize that it's affecting what they do."

Insulation is a curse of every president, but more than any president since Jimmy Carter, Obama comes across as an introvert, someone who finds extended contact with groups of people outside his immediate circle to be draining. He can rouse a stadium of 80,000 people, but that audience is an impersonal monolith; smaller group settings can be harder for him. Aides have learned that it can be good if he has a few moments after a big East Room event so he can gather his energy again. Unlike Clinton, who never met a rope line he did not want to work, Obama does not relish glad-handing. That's what he has Vice President Joe Biden for. When Obama addressed the Business Roundtable this year, he left after his speech without much meet-and-greet, leaving his aides frustrated that he had done himself more harm than good. He is not much for chitchat. When he and I sat down, he started our session matter-of-factly: "All right," he said, "fire away."

By all accounts, Obama copes with his political troubles with equanimity. "Zen" is the word commonly used in the West Wing. That's not to say he never loses his temper. He has been known to snap at aides when he feels overscheduled. He cuts off advisers who spout information straight from briefing papers with a testy "I've already read that." He does not like it when aides veer out of their assigned lanes, yet they have learned to show up at meetings with an opinion, because he zeroes in on those who stay silent. He was subdued during the Gulf of Mexico oil spill, when he found himself largely powerless. Other presidents took refuge at Camp David, but Michelle Obama has told dinner guests that her husband does not care for it all that much, because he is an urban guy. He blows off steam on the White House basketball court. "Come on, man, you've got to make that shot," he chides aides who play with him.

The most obvious sign of strain is in his hair. "He'll probably be unhappy with me for saying, but I've noticed he's gotten a little grayer," Defense Secretary Robert Gates told me over the summer. "These kinds of decisions do that to people." But the stress of the job remains mostly unspoken. "We usually will talk about writing the condolence letters," Gates added. "But other than that, we don't dwell on it." If anything, Obama more often than not bucks up young members of his staff, reminding them that politics, like life, is full of cycles and they will someday be able to tell their children that they were part of something big.

While Clinton made late-night phone calls around Washington to vent or seek advice, Obama rarely reaches outside the tight group of advisers like Emanuel, Axelrod, Rouse, Messina, Plouffe, Gibbs and Jarrett, as well as a handful of personal friends. "He's opaque even to us," an aide told me. "Except maybe for a few people in the inner circle, he's a closed book." In part because of security, just 15 people have his BlackBerry e-mail address. On long Air Force One flights, he retreats to the conference room and plays spades for hours, maintaining a trash-talking contest all the while, with the same three aides: Reggie Love, his personal assistant; Marvin Nicholson, his trip director; and Pete Souza, his White House photographer. (When I asked if he had an iPad, Obama said, "I have an iReggie, who has my books, my newspapers, my music all in one place.")

Jarrett attributes Obama's equilibrium to his upbringing. "He's really different," she told me. "It's rooted in his sense of self and how he grew up with a single mom, living at times on food stamps, working as a community organizer." As Gibbs put it: "He has a remarkable way of focusing on the big picture and the longer term. It's not to say that he's immune from criticism. But he can categorize in his head the difference between what's a setback, what's a bump along the way and what's just noise."

There is certainly no shortage of noise. But as Obama gets back on the campaign trail, aides have noticed his old spirit again. He particularly enjoys the so-called backyard sessions on the lawns of supporters. "That's the happiest I've seen him in a long time," an aide said. After one, Obama told the aide, "This reminds me of Iowa on the bus."

Nostalgia for the good old days of the campaign afflicts any White House in trouble. After all, those were the romantic moments when all was possible, when tens of thousands of people would gather in Grant Park to tear up over the promise of what will be. But in sober moments, Obama understands how selective the memories really are. "The mythology has emerged somehow that we ran this flawless campaign, I never made a mistake, that we were master communicators, everything worked in lock step," he told me. "And somehow now, as president, things are messy and they don't always work as planned and people are mad at us. That's not how I look at stuff, because I remember what the campaign was like. And it was just as messy and just as difficult. And there were all sorts of moments when our supporters lost hope, and it looked like we weren't going to win. And we're going through that same period here."

In covering the last three presidents, I have watched as each has been tested, albeit in very different circumstances — Clinton's impeachment over false testimony under oath about an affair with a White House intern, Bush's drive to begin a war that would drag on for years at enormous cost and Obama's struggle to turn around the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression. They are starkly variable crises, but some dynamics are familiar: presidents who live and die by polls insist they are not important when they fall; they argue that they are focused on principle, not politics, when it's almost always a mixture of both; they acknowledge difficulties but say they will pass; they portray themselves as courageous when flying against public opinion; they complain that the news media distort the situation and fuel division; they blame their opponents for practicing the politics of destruction and obstruction.

Talking with Obama and his aides, it's eerie to hear echoes of Clinton and Bush. Obama says the easy issues never make it to him, only the hard ones; Bush often said the same thing. Obama says our war with terrorists will never end in a surrender ceremony; Bush often said the same thing. Obama says he does not want to kick problems down the road; Bush often said the same thing. In the days leading up to the 1994 midterm elections, Clinton mocked Republicans for promising to balance the budget while cutting taxes, saying, "They're not serious." In our conversation, Obama used some variation of the phrase "they're not serious" four times in referring to Republican budget plans.

That is not to say the three men are alike; indeed, they are vastly different. But putting ideology aside, Obama at times seems to be a cross between his two predecessors. Like Clinton, he digs into the intellectual underpinnings of a policy decision, studying briefing books and seeking a range of opinions. Some aides express frustration that he can leave decisions unresolved for too long. But like Bush, once he has made a decision, Obama rarely revisits it. And like Bush, he runs a pretty disciplined operation; he started our interview a half-hour ahead of schedule, just as Bush sometimes did. Clinton, on the other hand, still runs on Clinton Standard Time. Just a few weeks ago, he was more than six hours late for a scheduled interview with another journalist. One constant among all three: It took Clinton and Bush some time to really grow into the presidency, until they wore it comfortably.

As Obama looks to the experiences of Clinton and Reagan, who both rebounded from midterm debacles to win re-election, the lessons differ. In Reagan's case, the House was already in Democratic hands, so during his first two years, he forged coalitions of Republicans and conservative Democrats. After the opposition was strengthened in the 1982 elections, that was no longer viable, and Reagan began working more with Democratic leaders. Clinton likewise changed course after the 1994 elections, emphasizing more incremental, piece-by-piece change rather than sweeping proposals and pursuing goals like welfare reform and balanced budgets when he could agree with Newt Gingrich's new majority.

Clinton, though, was more instinctively centrist than Obama is, and his revival owed much to other factors, particularly his leadership after the Oklahoma City bombing and his budget standoff with Gingrich during the partial government shutdown. Some argue Obama might be better off with at least one Republican chamber so he too has a foil as Clinton did. But it is unclear if Obama is as agile a politician as Reagan or Clinton. "He's no Bill Clinton when it comes to having the ability to move and to wiggle," says Joe Gaylord, a top Gingrich adviser. "I find rigidity in Obama that comes from his life in liberalism." Ken Duberstein likewise doubts Obama's capacity for adjustment. "They're much better at the art of campaigning than the art of governing," he said.

Perhaps the more important historical pattern to consider is this one: The last four presidents who failed to win a second term were all challenged in their own party. Lyndon Johnson was driven out of the race in 1968 after nearly losing the New Hampshire primary to Eugene McCarthy. Gerald Ford fended off Reagan in 1976 but went on to lose the general election to Carter, who likewise had to beat a primary challenger four years later, Ted Kennedy, before falling to Reagan. And George H. W. Bush had to overcome Patrick Buchanan before losing to Clinton in 1992.

So it is a high priority for Obama to prevent any intraparty fight in 2012, and to date, despite the fire from the left, no serious challenger appears on the horizon. Putting Hillary Clinton in the cabinet may turn out to be one of Obama's smartest moves, because it not only eliminated her as a would-be challenger, but it also should presumably squelch the will-she-or-won't-she speculation that otherwise would have played out for months. (Instead, the guessing game has her replacing Biden on the ticket, however fanciful that might be.)

As the first African-American president, Obama is more aware than most of the limits of looking back. But he also has read enough presidential biographies to know he is not the first to encounter rocky times. "History never precisely repeats itself," Obama told me. "But there is a pattern in American presidencies — at least modern presidencies. You come in with excitement and fanfare. The other party initially, having been beaten, says it wants to cooperate with you. You start implementing your program as you promised during the campaign. The other party pushes back very hard. It causes a lot of consternation and drama in Washington. People who are already cynical and skeptical about Washington generally look at it and say, This is the same old mess we've seen before. The president's poll numbers drop. And you have to then sort of wrestle back the confidence of the people as the programs that you've put in place start bearing fruit."

To better understand history, and his role in it, Obama invited a group of presidential scholars to dinner in May in the living quarters of the White House. Obama was curious about, among other things, the Tea Party movement. Were there precedents for this sort of backlash against the establishment? What sparked them and how did they shape American politics? The historians recalled the Know-Nothings in the 1850s, the Populists in the 1890s and Father Charles Coughlin in the 1930s. "He listened," the historian H. W. Brands told me. "What he concluded, I don't know."

Obama's conclusions are still being formed. He has learned that "Washington is even more broken than we thought," as one aide put it. He has trusted his own judgment as he disregarded advisers who told him to scale back health care at various stages. And he has found that his vaunted speaking skills are not enough to change the dynamics of governance. "One of the lessons he has to learn is What is the best form of communication for him with the American people," the historian Doris Kearns Goodwin told me. "He's so good in front of an audience, and I get the sense that he needs the energy off the audience. And so speaking to television cameras doesn't really do that."

As we talked in the Oval Office, Obama acknowledged that the succession of so many costly initiatives, necessary as they may have been, wore on the public. "That accumulation of numbers on the TV screen night in and night out in those first six months I think deeply and legitimately troubled people," he told me. "They started feeling like: Gosh, here we are tightening our belts, we're cutting out restaurants, we're cutting out our gym membership, in some cases we're not buying new clothes for the kids. And here we've got these folks in Washington who just seem to be printing money and spending it like nobody's business.

"And it reinforced the narrative that the Republicans wanted to promote anyway, which was Obama is not a different kind of Democrat — he's the same old tax-and-spend liberal Democrat."

Emanuel told me that the cascading crises in Obama's early days exacted a lasting toll. "The seeds of his political difficulty today were planted in taking those steps," he said. White House officials largely agree they should not have let the health care process drag out while waiting for Republican support that would never come. "It's not what people felt they sent Barack Obama to Washington to do, to be legislator in chief," a top adviser told me. "It lent itself to the perception that he wasn't doing anything on the economy." Plouffe agreed that guilt by association with Democratic lawmakers did not help. "When you swim in those waters, you're going to be affected by that," he said. "I do think he's paid a political price, somewhat, for having to be tied to Congress."

Still, for all the second-guessing, what you do not hear in the White House is much questioning of the basic elements of the program — Obama aides, liberal and moderate alike, reject complaints from the right that the stimulus did not help the economy or that health care expands government too much, as well as complaints from the left that he should have pushed for a bigger stimulus package or held out for a public health care option. "We asked for more stimulus than we ended up with," Larry Summers, the outgoing national economics adviser, told me. "But we fought as hard as we could, and I believe we got as much as Congress was ever going to give us at that time."

And they argue that any mistakes affected things only at the margins. "There's all this talk in this town — if we had done energy before health care, if we had focused more on small business, if we had done an Oval on the economy instead of Iraq, we would be doing better," Dan Pfeiffer, the communications director, says. "I don't believe that. We could always do things differently, and there are plenty of things I wish I had back. But I don't know they'd change the overall trend."

Melody Barnes, the president's domestic-policy adviser, says the biggest problem was that after eight years of Bush, Obama's supporters were very eager to change everything right away. "The pent-up demand across every issue area — around science, around education, around health care, immigration, you name it — there was a lot of desire to finally get these things done," she told me. "Every segment of the population had something that was very important to them that they really wanted to put over the finish line."

Obama is preaching patience in an impatient age. One prominent Democratic lawmaker told me Obama's problem is that he is not insecure — he always believes he is the smartest person in any room and never feels the sense of panic that makes a good politician run scared all the time, frenetically wooing lawmakers, power brokers, adversaries and voters as if the next election were a week away.

Instead, what you hear Obama aides talking about is that the system is "not on the level." That's a phrase commonly used around the West Wing — "it's not on the level." By that, they mean the Republicans, the news media, the lobbyists, the whole Washington culture is not serious about solving problems. The challenge, as they see it, is how to rise above a town that can obsess for a week on whether an obscure Agriculture Department official in Georgia should have been fired. At the same time, as Emanuel told me, "We have to play the game."

As Brands, the historian, put it, "It'll be really interesting to see if a president who is thinking long term can have an impact on a political system that is almost irredeemably short term in its perspective."

"I'd rather be a really good one-term president than a mediocre two-term president." So Obama told Diane Sawyer of ABC News last January at another low point, just after the Republican Scott Brown captured the Massachusetts Senate seat held for decades by Ted Kennedy, costing Democrats their filibuster-proof control of the upper chamber and jeopardizing the president's health care plan.

It's a good line, but it's one of those things easier said in the first or second year of a presidency. By the third, it starts to become an actual choice. Forks in the road require a president to decide if he will advance ideas that will genuinely change the country even if deeply unpopular or if he will opt instead for a safer route that does not put re-election at risk. Obama aides like to argue that he has already demonstrated willingness to put aside politics by bailing out the banks and automakers, decisions that he saw as critical to preventing greater economic catastrophe (and that ultimately cost taxpayers far less than initially feared).

But would he jeopardize re-election absent an immediate crisis? The choice may confront him soon after the midterms when his bipartisan fiscal commission reports back by Dec. 1 with plans to tame the national deficit with a politically volatile menu of unpalatable options, like scaling back Medicare and Social Security while raising taxes. Obama also anticipates putting immigration reform, another divisive issue fraught with political danger, back on the table. "If the question is, Over the next two years do I take a pass on tough stuff," he told me, "the answer is no."

Obama's aides say they will most likely set up their re-election campaign around next March, roughly the same as when Bush and Clinton incorporated their incumbent campaign operations. They are more optimistic about 2012 than they are about 2010, believing the Tea Party will re-elect Barack Obama by pulling the Republican nominee to the right. They doubt Sarah Palin will run and figure Mitt Romney cannot get the Republican nomination because he enacted his own health care program in Massachusetts. If they had to guess today, some in the White House say that Obama will find himself running against Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor.

With that campaign on the horizon, Obama asked Pete Rouse and Jim Messina to begin thinking about the next phase of his presidency, not just personnel but also priorities and message. Never mind that Rouse was among those who wanted to leave — for years, he has been saying he wanted out of politics but never says no to Obama. Indeed, when Rouse told colleagues he wanted to leave the White House by the end of this year, Messina bet him $400 that he would not. "We'll see what happens," Rouse told me when I asked about the bet last month. Then Obama made Rouse interim chief of staff. Rouse initially resisted moving into Rahm Emanuel's corner suite until colleagues threatened to move his files for him. Messina jokes that Rouse will turn off the Oval Office lights after eight years and before assuming his new job, running Obama's presidential library.

Rouse is managing a slow-motion White House shuffle. By year's end, there will be a new chief of staff, a new national-economics adviser, a new budget director, a new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and a new national-security adviser, among others. Axelrod and Messina expect to leave by spring to set up Obama's re-election effort, and Plouffe will almost certainly come into the White House in a senior role.

"There are a lot of lessons learned in the last two years in terms of how we might improve internal communication, encourage greater accountability without discouraging individual initiative," said one aide familiar with the discussions led by Rouse and Messina. Obama has been aggravated by friction among his advisers. "He's a little frustrated with the internal dysfunction," the aide said. "He doesn't like confrontation." But his initial choices to fill open slots have been drawn largely from his administration, suggesting more continuity than change.

Rouse and Messina see areas for possible bipartisan agreement, like reauthorizing the nation's education laws to include reform measures favored by centrists and conservatives, passing long-pending trade pacts and possibly even producing scaled-back energy legislation. "You'll hear more about exports and less about public spending," a senior White House official said. "You'll hear more about initiative and private sector and less about the Department of Energy. You'll hear more about government as a financier and less about government as a hirer."

Obama expressed optimism to me that he could make common cause with Republicans after the midterm elections. "It may be that regardless of what happens after this election, they feel more responsible," he said, "either because they didn't do as well as they anticipated, and so the strategy of just saying no to everything and sitting on the sidelines and throwing bombs didn't work for them, or they did reasonably well, in which case the American people are going to be looking to them to offer serious proposals and work with me in a serious way."

I asked if there were any Republicans he trusted enough to work with on economic issues. The first name he came up with was Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, who initially agreed to serve as Obama's commerce secretary before changing his mind. But Gregg is retiring. The only other Republican named by Obama was Paul Ryan, the Wisconsin congressman who has put together a detailed if politically problematic blueprint for reducing federal spending. The two men are ideologically poles apart, but perhaps Obama sees a bit of himself in a young, substantive policy thinker.

Even if such an alliance emerges, though, the next two years will be mostly about cementing what Obama did in his first two years — and defending it against challenges in Congress and the courts. "Even if I had the exact same Congress, even if we don't lose a seat in the Senate and we don't lose a seat in the House, I think the rhythms of the next two years would inevitably be different from the rhythms of the first two years," Obama told me. "There's going to be a lot of work in this administration just doing things right and making sure that new laws are stood up in the ways they're intended."

As a senior adviser put it, "There's going to be very little incentive for big things over the next two years unless there's some sort of crisis." Yet Obama and his aides still scorn Bill Clinton's small-bore approach. "It's fair to assume you're not going to see school uniforms play a big role in the next two years," Plouffe told me. "His view is you can't spend two years playing four-corners." Before he left, Emanuel told me: "I'm not of the view that you do nothing. I think you've got to have an agenda."

But what sort of agenda? Not as sweeping and not as provocative, say some advisers. "It will have to be limited and focused on the things that are achievable and high priorities for the American people," Dick Durbin told me. Tom Daschle said Obama would have to reach out to adversaries. "The lessons of the last two years are going to be critical," he told me. "The key word is 'inclusion.' He's got to find ways to be inclusive."

Rendell thinks otherwise. "Don't care so much about bipartisanship if the Republicans continue to refuse to cooperate," he advised. "Do what you have to do. Fight back." At the same time, he said, stop moaning about what he inherited: "After the election, I'd say no more pointing back, no more blaming the Bush administration. It's O.K. to do that during the campaign and then stop. But to do it as much as we do it, it sounds like a broken record. And after two years, you own it."

Obama will own it for another two years, or six if he can find his way forward. As an author, Obama appreciates the rhythms of a tumultuous story. But who is the protagonist, really? At bottom, this president is still a mystery to many Americans. During the campaign, he sold himself — or the idea of himself — more than any particular policy, and voters filled in the lines as they chose. He was, as he said at the time, the ultimate Rorschach test.

Now the lines are being filled in further. With each choice Obama makes, he further defines himself for better or worse in Americans' minds. He says he knows where he is going and is gathering momentum despite the hurdles ahead. As he told a group of visitors during the week last spring that Congress passed health care and his administration reached agreement on an arms-control treaty with Russia, "I start slow, but I finish strong."

He will have to, if the history he is writing is to turn out the way he prefers.

Subject: Tony Blair on the American Ideal

Americans can be all that the rest of the world sometimes accuses them of: brash, loud, insular, obsessive and heavy-handed. But America is great for a reason. It is looked up to, despite all the criticism, for a reason. There is a nobility in the American character that has been developed over the centuries, derived in part, no doubt, from the frontier spirit, from the waves of migration that form the stock, from the circumstances of independence, from the Civil War, from a myriad of historical facts and coincidences. But it is there.

That nobility isn't about being nicer, better or more successful than anyone else. It is a feeling about the country. It is a devotion to the American ideal that at a certain point transcends class, race, religion or upbringing. That ideal is about values: freedom, the rule of law, democracy. It is also about the way you achieve: on merit, by your own efforts and hard work. But it is most of all that in striving for and protecting that ideal, you as an individual take second place to the interests of the nation as a whole. It is what makes the country determined to overcome its challenges. It is what makes its soldiers give their lives in sacrifice. It is what brings every variety of American, from the lowest to the highest, to their feet when "The Star-Spangled Banner" is played. Of course the ideal is not always met — that is obvious. But it is always striven for.

The Need for American Confidence

The next years will test the American character. America won't be loved in this presidency any more than in previous ones. But America should have confidence. That ideal, which produces the optimism that generates the achievement, is worth all the striving. It is the most precious gift a nation can have. The world is changing. New powers are emerging. But this does not diminish the need for that American ideal. It reaffirms it, renews it, gives it added relevance. There is always one, more prosaic, test of a nation's position: Are people trying to get into it, or to get out of it? I think we know the answer to that in America's case, and that ideal is the reason.

A friend of mine whose parents were immigrants, Jews from Europe who came to America in search of safety, told me this story. His parents lived and worked in New York. They were not well off. His father died when he was young. His mother lived on, and in time my friend succeeded and became wealthy. He often used to offer his mother the chance to travel outside America. She never did. When eventually she died, they went back to recover the safety box where she kept her jewelry. They found there was another box. There was no key. So they had to drill it open. They wondered what precious jewel must be in it. They lifted the lid. There was wrapping and more wrapping and finally an envelope. Intrigued, they opened it. In the envelope were her U.S. citizenship papers. Nothing more. That was the jewel, more precious to her than any other possession. That was what she treasured most. So should America today.

One fact that people may not be aware of is that immediately following the election, newly elected Senators in IL, WV, CO and DE will serve during the lame duck session. In a worst case scenario, that could bring the Senate Dem total down to 55, which will impact our strategy on START and appropriations, at a minimum.

Dear Capricia,

As time moves on, I realize I haven't seen you and Mrs. Clinton (Hillary) in a long time, but I think of you both often. I don't know if movie producers are still worthy in your world, but next time you're in NYC I'd love to see you.

I have such fond memories of you guys watching SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE. I made another movie you might like about the ascendancy of King George after Edward abdicated, it's called KINGS SPEECH. The movie brings to light something that many people don't know, which is that King George was a stutterer and he hired an actor to try and help him overcome it. It's a fun movie that is much in the tradition of SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE, again I think you would both like it (and Hillary would approve because it's PG-13 with not too many swear words).

If you have any trips coming up I'd love to send it to you so you guys can watch and give me your opinion. I could also include a copy of THE TILLMAN STORY, that one is obviously not a happy film, but it's an incredibly important one.

Harvey

JERUSALEM (Reuters) - Israeli aircraft struck targets in the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip after Palestinian militants fired a rocket from the territory into Israel, security officials and witnesses said. Early September 4, Gaza militants fired a rocket into southern Israel, causing no injuries, the Israeli military said. Hours later, witnesses and Hamas security officials said Israeli aircraft fired rockets at targets in Gaza, including smuggling tunnels along the border with Egypt. At least two people were wounded, medical workers said.

Thanks for making the START calls. Will follow-up as discussed.

On election news, Murkowski has come back a bit, but is still down a good 2K votes. Many rural precincts have yet to report, and there are some 7600 absentee ballots yet to be counted. Will likely take another week to come to closure.

With 429 of 438 precincts reporting

Joe Miller (R) 45,909 51.09%
Lisa Murkowski (R) 43,949 48.91%

Subject: Tony Blair on the American Ideal

Americans can be all that the rest of the world sometimes accuses them of: brash, loud, insular, obsessive and heavy-handed. But America is great for a reason. It is looked up to, despite all the criticism, for a reason. There is a nobility in the American character that has been developed over the centuries, derived in part, no doubt, from the frontier spirit, from the waves of migration that form the stock, from the circumstances of independence, from the Civil War, from a myriad of historical facts and coincidences. But it is there.

That nobility isn't about being nicer, better or more successful than anyone else. It is a feeling about the country. It is a devotion to the American ideal that at a certain point transcends class, race, religion or upbringing. That ideal is about values: freedom, the rule of law, democracy. It is also about the way you achieve: on merit, by your own efforts and hard work. But it is most of all that in striving for and protecting that ideal, you as an individual take second place to the interests of the nation as a whole. It is what makes the country determined to overcome its challenges. It is what makes its soldiers give their lives in sacrifice. It is what brings every variety of American, from the lowest to the highest, to their feet when "The Star-Spangled Banner" is played. Of course the ideal is not always met — that is obvious. But it is always striven for.

The Need for American Confidence

The next years will test the American character. America won't be loved in this presidency any more than in previous ones. But America should have confidence. That ideal, which produces the optimism that generates the achievement, is worth all the striving. It is the most precious gift a nation can have. The world is changing. New powers are emerging. But this does not diminish the need for that American ideal. It reaffirms it, renews it, gives it added relevance. There is always one, more prosaic, test of a nation's position: Are people trying to get into it, or to get out of it? I think we know the answer to that in America's case, and that ideal is the reason.

A friend of mine whose parents were immigrants, Jews from Europe who came to America in search of safety, told me this story. His parents lived and worked in New York. They were not well off. His father died when he was young. His mother lived on, and in time my friend succeeded and became wealthy. He often used to offer his mother the chance to travel outside America. She never did. When eventually she died, they went back to recover the safety box where she kept her jewelry. They found there was another box. There was no key. So they had to drill it open. They wondered what precious jewel must be in it. They lifted the lid. There was wrapping and more wrapping and finally an envelope. Intrigued, they opened it. In the envelope were her U.S. citizenship papers. Nothing more. That was the jewel, more precious to her than any other possession. That was what she treasured most. So should America today.

Dear Boss,

Still working it down the last day.

We got the Amb some good photo ops in the flood zone...

Larry

"A Bag of Flour," an op-ed by Javed Chaudhry in liberal Urdu daily "Express" (cir. 25,000) (11/02)

"... It was the picture of a U.S. helicopter parked at a helipad in Sukkur. Many people clad in military uniforms were unloading the relief goods for flood-affected people in the Sindh province. A middle-aged American national, wearing a shirt and grey pants and carrying a 40-kg flour bag, immediately caught my attention. It took me hardly a few seconds to recognize him. He was no other than the new U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan, Mr. Cameron Munter. During my recent visit to the United States, I had the chance to meet him at the residence of our Ambassador in Washington, Mr. Hussain Haqqani. In a lighter vein, he (Ambassador Munter) asked me and other Pakistani journalists, present on the occasion, that 'please don't pester me during my stay in Pakistan because I am very scared of the Pakistani media even now in my own country.' These words garnered a resounding laughter from all of us. It was my first meeting with Ambassador Munter. Now he is in Pakistan where the U.S. Ambassador is always more busy even than the host country's president. Within a week after his arrival in Pakistan, the U.S. Ambassador reached Sukkur along with relief goods for the flood-affected people who are still languishing in makeshift tents. To the much astonishment of common Pakistanis, he, along with other ordinary officials, started unloading the relief goods with his own hands, and all major newspapers of the country gave front-page coverage to this picture. This photo conveyed two messages to us: first, the great nations also have great traditions, and second, relatively small nations, like us, possess low status because our leaders are totally devoid of such humbleness. The U.S. ambassadors virtually enjoy the viceregal status in third world countries, but despite enjoying such kingly powers they adopt very humble attitude towards other people. They treat even the attendants, drivers, and other employees in their personal staff as human beings. And whenever some natural disaster visits the populations of the host countries, the U.S. ambassadors in those states rush to help the devastated people. Ambassador Cameron Munter could also have behaved like our rulers and distribute relief goods among affected people while himself dressed in precious costumes... Even if his attitude was part of the U.S. propaganda, why our rulers cannot display such ostentations for the welfare of their subjects? The second message this picture conveyed is that we Pakistanis lack humbleness. For our politicians, the ordinary people are nothing more than votes who catapult them into the corridors of power. On the other hand, after winning the elections, American politicians live among their people. They travel side by side with the common man in public transport and shake hands with them in ordinary restaurants. This picture says that until Prime Minister Gilani picks up a flour bag on his shoulders and carries it to a common Pakistani, he cannot change the destiny of this nation."

Hi Cheryl -

Goodwin is in DC and met with Reid's staff. It looks like he is really going to go ahead and file cloture!! See also the article from the BLT today.

Goodwin also met with Feinstein, which was a difficult meeting. If you have time, I'd like to confidentially discuss with you. I can set my alarm to get up and talk to you at 6 or 6:30 a.m. in the morning your time if that is the best time to reach you. Are you still at [redacted]

November 17, 2010

Democrats Plan Votes on Controversial Nominees, Senator Says

President Barack Obama's nominees for the federal judiciary have stalled for months in part because of heated disagreement over a handful of nominees. Now, Senate Democrats are looking at forcing votes on four of them.

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) said today that Democrats could move soon to end debate on the nominees. He said that Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was lining up support this morning for what's known as a cloture petition — the necessary paperwork before holding a vote to end debate.

"He's lining up the signatures," Whitehouse said after a meeting of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Such a petition requires 16 signatures.

Whitehouse is a vocal supporter of one of the nominees who have drawn fire: John McConnell Jr., a Motley Rice partner who's been nominated for federal district court in Rhode Island. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is opposing McConnell's nomination, citing his work as a plaintiffs' lawyer on lead paint litigation and other cases.

The other three nominees whom Reid is trying to force votes on, Whitehouse said, are Goodwin Liu for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, Edward Chen for the Northern District of California and Louis Butler for the Western District of Wisconsin. Republicans have targeted all three because of what they call the nominees' extreme views, while the nominees' home-state senators and other supporters argue they're being treated unfairly.

A fifth nominee whom Republicans oppose, Judge Robert Chatigny for the 2nd Circuit, is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee. A committee vote is planned for Thursday.

Though senators have many other priorities during their "lame duck" session, Whitehouse said he thinks there is time to consider the stalled nominees. Otherwise, he said, "there'd be no point getting the signatures" for the cloture petition.

Senate rules require 60 votes to end debate on a nominee or a bill, unless senators agree to waive a vote entirely. Democrats control 59 Senate seats until January.

On Monday, conservatives sent a letter to Reid asking him not to force votes on any nominees between the midterm elections and the start of the next Congress. "Any 'lame-duck' confirmations would be a gross abuse of Congressional authority in a last gasp attempt to perpetuate an agenda that the American people have already rejected," the letter says.

NEW DELHI (Reuters) - India's lower house of parliament on August 25 approved of a landmark bill to open up the country's $150 billion nuclear power market, after the government agreed to tougher provisions that an industry group said would hamper the sector's growth. The bill is needed for the entry of firms such as U.S.-based General Electric and Westinghouse Electric, a subsidiary of Japan's Toshiba Corp, who are reluctant to step in without clarity on accident compensation.

Subject: Personal - a personal favor

My dear friend Hillary:

I hate to email you too much ☹ and to ask you for any favors. I feel as if I am taking advantage of a great privilege that you allow me to send you a personal email every so often. But this is a favor that I fully understand for 100 reasons might not be appropriate or comfortable for you to say yes to.

The American Lawyer is doing a Cover Story (ugh!) about my new law firm, ☹Lanny J. Davis &

Associates◆ ◆ about my finally hanging up my own shingle after all these years and at a ripe young age, with a 12 year-old and a 5 year-old to pay college tuition for to I can◆t even state the age I will be in writing when I write my last tuition check.

I am quite concerned ◆even though the reporter for the American Lawyer, David Levine, seems to be a nice young man (which makes me even more concerned ◆ sometimes the nicest ones can burn you the worst. ◆(You, of all people, should know!)

I have given David Levine, the American Lawyer reporter, a list of friends, business, personal, and political, to call. ◆I fully anticipate there will be personal and professional mean-spirited shots at me in the story ◆ that is inevitable ◆ especially from those attorneys who still don◆t accept that what I do is unusual as well as the hateful rightwing (and perhaps even more from the left, who don◆t like my ◆Purple Nation◆ approach and my effort to help make bad countries better!!!).

To try to balance the cheap shots, I have asked a variety of people from Ds and Rs and in between to talk to the reporter about me. ◆Ted Olsen did and said great things. So did Mike McCurry and Karl Rove (!!!). ◆Even President Clinton and President Bush, I am told, may weigh in with nice written statements about their old friend from Yale days. ◆And believe it or not, even Senator McCain called the reporter personally on his cell phone to tell him how much he appreciated my bipartisan ◆Purple Nation◆ approach to politics (inspired, of course, by my friend the great former Junior Senator from New York, Hillary Clinton, whom my friend Lindsey Graham once told me was the nicest and most effective person in the U.S. Senate!).

My message that I hope gets reflected in the article is that I and my law firm offer unique multi-disciplinary capabilities in law, media and politics: ◆first, ◆traditional legal advice and litigation, which allows me to get all the facts, good and bad, under the crucial protection of attorney-client privilege; media experience, understanding that reporters need facts and you have to fight to get them to focus on facts, not innuendo, win the trust, so that they will give the person for whom I am advocating a break and actually try to be fair and accurate; and finally, politics and legislative strategies, which often helps clients solve litigation solutions where the courts are not working. ◆You can see where the shots may come from ◆ lawyers who feel threatened by my unusual multi-disciplinary approach; public relations firms, who don◆t thinks lawyers should talk to the media; and lobbyists, who think they should be left alone and not be bothered about being careful with the facts when approaching an elected official.

So my question to you, good friend Hillary, is:

Would you be willing to talk personally to the reporter? ◆I assume the answer will no ◆ since I can see that that might be inappropriate. ◆And if that is your answer, I completely understand.

So my second question is, if the first one is no: ◆Would you be willing to have Philippe or Cheryl issue a statement to the reporter, David Levine, on your behalf about your opinion of my professional skills and/or our friendship over the years?

Please please please ◆ note there are ◆three pleases◆: ◆Do not be bashful or concerned about saying no to my request. ◆As you can see, I have a number of people who have talked to the reporter or, in the case of President Clinton and President Bush, who may be giving written statements.

I wasn◆t even going to ask you for that reason since I didn◆t want you to feel badly if you have to say no. ◆But then again. The honest to goodness truth is, : ◆Aside from Carolyn, my four children, and my immediate family, I consider you to be the best friend and the best person I have met in my long life. ◆You know that from the dedication and appreciation of you I have always felt and expressed to you over four decades. ◆ So that is why your comments would mean a lot to me, even if just a written statement.

BUT: ◆one more please (#4) ◆ if it feels inappropriate to you as Secretary of State or for any other reason to be in a quote about me on a personal or professional level, I fully understand.

Thanks for just considering this, my good friend Hillary. ◆If the answer is yes, just tell me know by return email (or have someone call my assistant, Maddie Melendez, [redacted] B6 who the reporter should contact at your office, ◆and when. ◆Unfortunately the deadline is within the next two weeks.

Best and warmest regards,

Lanny

BERLIN (Reuters) - An Iranian woman whose sentence of execution by stoning for adultery provoked a worldwide outcry will instead be hanged for murder on November 3, a human rights group said.

"The authorities in Tehran have given the go-ahead to Tabriz prison for the execution of Iran stoning case Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani," the International Committee against Stoning, a German-based campaign group, said on its website.

"It has been reported that she is to be executed this Wednesday, 3 November."

Officials in Iran were not available to confirm or deny the report.

MUSCAT (AP) - An American woman released from Iran after more than 13 months in custody began her journey back to the United States after asking her supporters to "extend your prayers" to her fiancé and another American man who remain in Tehran accused of spying. In a brief statement, Sarah Shourd thanked Oman for mediating the $500,000 bail that led to her freedom earlier this week. But she made no mention of her ordeal inside Tehran's notorious Evin Prison or any health problems- which her mother has said include a breast lump and precancerous cervical cells. "Please, please extend your prayers" to the other two Americans still held- her fiancé Shane Bauer and their friend Josh Fattal- she said at Oman's international airport before boarding an Oman Air flight on the first leg of her trip home accompanied by her mother Nora and an uncle. She was next scheduled to appear at a news conference in New York on September 19 timed to coincide with the arrival of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to attend the UN General Assembly. Shourd, 32, appeared in good spirits and less gaunt than when she stepped off a private Omani jet after her release from Iran. She thanked Omani officials for playing an intermediary role between Iran and the United States for her release. "I'll always associate your country with the first breath of my freedom, the sweet smell of sandalwood and a chance to stand by the ocean listening to the waves," she said, wearing long-sleeve black T-shirt covered by a white top and white sneakers.

Re: Post mid-terms strategy

What I hear from Republican sources and elsewhere and what it means for Republican strategy:

1. Rove is telling his donors that the ticket in 2012 is Romney/Barbour. Haley Barbour is Rove's ally. Together they constitute the heart of the GOP establishment. In a potential Republican administration Barbour would be a new kind of Cheney, but more politically skillful.
2. Rove is at war with Palin. He has told his donors she must be stopped. Palin is well aware. The Politico story filled with anonymous quotes about a murky establishment vs. Palin is about the Death Star of Rove/Barbour. Ironies: Rove doubled down on a base strategy for Bush, galvanizing the right wing, now spun out of his control to Palin. The GOP used the far right and Palin in the mid-terms and now have to kill them in presidential nomination politics. Attacking Palin only builds her stature with the right. She plays instinctively to the base, but can she play a long game against the big boys determined to destroy her?
3. Palin has already aligned Glenn Beck and Rush Limbaugh on her side. Fox News is being split. Murdoch gave his big donation to the Republican Governors Association, headed by Barbour.
4. Malcolm Hoenlein has been raising money hand over fist for the Republicans through Eric Cantor, now his vehicle. The donors are many of the same US donors to Bibi and Likud. Implications obvious.
5. The House Republicans have already planned to primary all Senate Republican moderates in the next cycle. Olympia Snowe is a particular target.
6. In the Senate, Jim DeMint continues to be a Fifth Column of the right, allied to the House Republicans, against remaining Senate GOP moderates. He will be reinforced after this election with Rand Paul, et al. Paul, of course, hates Mitch McConnell, and vice versa.
7. McConnell's statement the day before the mid-terms that the goal of the GOP is to make Obama a one term president is, in fact, their agenda. Everything in the House and Senate will be bent to that end.
8. Can the House Republicans and Senate Republicans restrain themselves in their own interest and McConnell's stated aim? Boehner is despised by the younger, more conservative members of the House Republican Conference. They are repelled by his personal behavior. He is louche, alcoholic, lazy, and without any commitment to any principle. Boehner has already tried to buy the members with campaign contributions and committee assignments, which he has already promised to potentially difficult members. His hold is insecure. He is not Gingrich, the natural leader of a "revolution," riding the crest into power. He is careworn and threadbare, banal and hollow, holding nobody's enduring loyalty. Boehner is beholden and somewhat scared of his base. He twitches when they make gestures that might undermine his position. His impulse is to hand out money. His aim is to recreate DeLay, Inc, with Jerry Lewis, who will be the new chairman of Appropriations. But Boehner is neither feared nor loved. He's a would-be DeLay without the whip. He's the one at the end of the lash. Which means he will be under great pressure and find it hard to sustain a moderate, reasonable strategy of restraint. McConnell is relatively in the same position in the Senate. On the other hand, the Congressional Republicans are vulnerable to a strategy that takes advantage of their internal divisions. Policies/tactics should be calculated to locate GOP fissures, find political space by widening schisms, and ultimately break them apart. This is, emphatically, not a strategy of bipartisanship as Obama has pursued it so far. It is a different and more informed approach.

We've been in touch with Ambassador Susan Jacobs--she is on the road now, but I understand that she did speak with Mr. Bower earlier today. We are keeping her posted on all of these developments.

Someone is apparently providing the Bower family with misinformed "readouts" of both the Secretary's meeting with President Mubarak last week and Senator Kerry's phone call with President Mubarak yesterday (Friday)--and these "readouts" do not/not conform with what we understand actually took place. We do not know the source of this misinformation. When our officers have tried to explain the state of play, the family cite other unspecified sources telling them that the boys will be released.

I intend to see Mr. Bower when he is here either tomorrow or Monday and hope to get us back onto the same page.

There is no/no indication that the GOE intends to intervene in the judicial process which has yet to fully hear Mr. Bower's legal challenge to his wife's Egyptian custody order. As I read the read-out of Sen Kerry call to President Mubarak (forwarded in separate email), Mubarak said he could not intervene in the judicial process.

The next hearing is set for October. [redacted] B6

A meeting on Sept 20th has been set for Mr. Bowers, the Egyptian "Good Intentions Committee" which is an extra-judicial group of officials who try to facilitate resolution of custody cases involving foreign parents (but the committee has no authority to order the children's return to Mr. Bowers), and the ex-wife, and possibly the children.

We have been urging the GOE to assure that the boys are available to see their father on the 20th. We do not expect that the boys will be released to him and do not understand how the family came to believe this.

Apparently Secretary Clinton got Mubarak's agreement to release the boys. The father is headed to Cairo on Monday to pick them up at the embassy. Staff at the embassy and at the State Dept is now saying that this is only a visitation. As you can imagine the family is really upset and the supporters are livid. They are expecting that Colin will be headed back to the states with the boys Tuesday. The press wants to know what is going on. Any advice here, because I have no idea what is going on? With regard to the two tops, I agree that Lissa's original top was more elegant, but Jim thought, and Jake and I agreed, that the piece is not as compelling as it could be if we could be clearer about what you actually see coming down the road that informs your focus on modernizing diplomacy (e.g., you see the proliferation of foundations, corporations, ngos in the world as an opportunity, particularly given that we have more problems to deal with with the same bandwidth, so you want to start training people now to do public private partnerships; or you see public opinion as steadily increasing in importance, so we have to be doing public engagement in a big way). I tried to do that quickly in the following graph, but w/o being able to draw all the connections.

Subject: Week ahead

I'm off to Seattle for a conf on development and women at Microsoft and mtgs with Gates, etc.
I wanted to tell you that for your trip to Russia, we have an announcement for you to Gov of St Petersburg who is the highest ranking female official in the Russian govt. When I saw her some months ago, she went on at length about her respect for you and her meeting with you when you were Senator (she also met you at the Rejkavik VV conf in '98) We are going to hold a US-Russia women leaders Summit in St P in april. It is in response to what I heard over and over during my trip earlier this year that there is a strong desire (and need) to engage with US. Women and the women's issues have been mostly off the agenda since the days we made it such a priority in the 90's and there is considerable recidivism. She should be happy about the proposed summit.

Secondly, when you meet with the Lithuanian FM this week, he will invite you to the community of Democ ministerial (end for Lith presidency) and as part of it a women and democ. Conf that will mark 10 years since the last one that was held in the continuum you started. There are so many different needs today.

Have a good trip.

En route back from India and China. It was good I went to Chennai where I had a full schedule including meeting with another self-help group like SEWA (500 poor women showed up) It took me back to our trips. Also met with the local elected village council -- remarkable group of empowered women. I took both experiences to our strategic dialogue meeting in Delhi where we made excellent progress. We also met with the "cookstove" officials to give them heads up about your initiative (told Roemer too). SEWA will be on stage with you at CGI!
Other good meetings with SEWA on markets, Afghanistan, and solar lanterns. Vital Voices conf was a huge succss. I couldn't stay for much but your video was well received, Hormats was terrific (he's becoming a rock star with women!) And F Secretary Rao did a nice job.

Our China experience provided a lot of insights and we will do a short strategy paper for you. We moved the women's leadership forum forward. Suifficeth to say, there are so many opportunities that I believe we should be taking advantage of, (which we are not doing) including in the economics track. The women there are growing in power and influence. More later.

I'll see you for the NY marathon!

Paradigm Shift: Forward-Deployed American Engagement in Asia

by Ernie Bower

Ernest Z. Bower is the senior adviser and director of the Southeast Asia Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, D.C.

Experts identify trends by defining inflection points at which dynamics change and a new paradigm takes hold. As U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton embarks on her sixth trip to Asia and President Barack Obama prepares for his second visit to the region, the outlines of a U.S. strategy for Asia are being revealed. A new chapter is being written and it could be entitled "Forward-Deployed Diplomacy."

Looking back, the point of departure for the new dynamic was Secretary Clinton's strong intervention, backed by a consensus of concerned partners, at the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) in Hanoi in late July.

It was Clinton's determination to speak directly and clearly on the South China Sea issue at the ARF that defined a real and renewed American commitment not only to be substantively involved in the creation of new trade and security architecture in the Asia Pacific, but to be present consistently whenever and wherever discussions of issues of interest to the United States and the Asia Pacific take place. At the same venue, China punctuated its remarkable two-decade charm offensive toward Southeast Asia by misjudging how it is perceived by its neighbors and overreacting to a unified expression of will to work multilaterally, advised by international law, to resolve disputes in the region. China's unmasking tapped into atavistic anxieties about how it might pursue its core interests among the ASEAN countries at the same time that Japan and Korea were getting in touch with those very same concerns over China's response to the Senkaku and Diaoyu Islands and handling North Korea after the sinking of the Cheonan.

Clinton's words were instructive. They were not words that could be uttered by a principal who was not willing to back them up. The Obama administration had decided to embark on a forward-deployed diplomatic push toward Asia.

Trips by the secretaries of state and defense and by President Obama can be understood in this context. Secretary Clinton and Secretary Robert Gates have visited Asia regularly and with purpose. Key criteria supporting the United States' decision to join the East Asia Summit (EAS) and advising Secretary Gates' enthusiastic response to Vietnam's invitation to join the ASEAN Defense Ministers' Meeting Plus included three important points:

1. Recognition that ASEAN would be the core of these new structures;
2. Understanding that structures would be ineffective unless ASEAN is strengthened; and,
3. Commitment to substantively deepen and strengthen ties with ASEAN and its key members.

Between them, Secretary Clinton and President Obama will visit 4 of the 10 ASEAN countries on their trips over the next two weeks. Secretary Clinton's trip includes seven countries in Asia, one of the most extensive visits of any American secretary of state. She has visited Vietnam not only to accept the invitation for the United States to join the EAS, but also to hold another meeting of the Lower Mekong Initiative, a smart partnership with four mainland Southeast Asia countries—Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Vietnam—focused on sustainable development, environmental issues, energy, and climate change. The Vietnam visit further cemented strengthening U.S.–Vietnam bilateral ties, marking American commitment to find alignment with one of ASEAN's most enthusiastic members.

Secretary Clinton will also visit Guam, Cambodia, Malaysia, Papua New Guinea, New Zealand, and Australia. In each venue, as explored below in the Southeast Asia from the Corner of 18th & K country reports, Clinton is making notable progress in advancing U.S. ties with important partners in the Asia Pacific.

For his part, President Obama has accepted responsibility for strengthening the two vitally important relationships with India and Indonesia, respectively the second- and fourth-largest countries in the world and the second- and third-largest democracies. The India relationship is solid and getting stronger. The Indonesia relationship is one that the Obama administration wants to transform along the lines the Bush administration achieved with India. President Obama will launch the Comprehensive Partnership with his counterpart, President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, and the pair will then travel to Korea for the G-20 Summit and to Japan for the APEC Leaders' Summit.

This year is ending well for the United States in Asia, but there are two questions Asian leaders will have for Secretary Clinton and President Obama: (1) is the U.S. economy on a steady path to recovery; and (2) can the United States resume a leadership position on trade?

The acid test for sustained U.S. engagement in Asia is a healthy and growing American economy and passing the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement (KORUS). Asia knows that if President Obama is willing—after the U.S. midterm elections today—to spend real political capital on KORUS, then the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) becomes a real and meaningful negotiation. If not, the U.S. strategy for engaging Asia with ASEAN as a fulcrum will be incomplete and unconvincing.

July was an inflection point for a new paradigm of enhanced U.S. commitment and engagement in Asia. If the administration is able to sustain and advance economic recovery and move on trade, it is likely that Hillary Clinton's legacy as secretary of state will be as the forward-deployed diplomat who recovered Asia for the United States at the outset of the twenty-first century.

The Week That Was

PREPARATION FOR SUMMITRY

Southeast Asia, along with partners throughout the Asia-Pacific region, spent the week preparing for and beginning an intense set of leaders' summits, including the 17th ASEAN Leaders Summit and the 5th East Asia Summit (both in Hanoi, Vietnam), the G-20 Leaders' Summit (in Seoul, Korea), and the APEC Leaders' Summit (in Yokohama, Japan).

NATURAL DISASTERS

Southeast Asia is among the world areas most vulnerable to natural disasters. Over the last several weeks, that fact has been tragically underlined, pointing to the need for regional governments and militaries to improve coordination on humanitarian assistance and disaster relief efforts. The events are a tragic but timely motivation for developing new security architecture—a challenge that the region's leaders focused on in Hanoi at the newly expanded East Asia Summit.

Tsunami death toll reaches 408. A 7.7-magnitude earthquake off the coast of West Sumatra triggered tsunami waves up to 26 feet high that crashed through the Mentawai Islands on October 25, 2010. The waves flattened villages and destroyed 25,000 homes. Some 13,000 people have been displaced and are living in camps. Another 300 are missing, and rescuers expect most to have perished. Due to the poor infrastructure of the islands, relief efforts have focused on using helicopters and warships to deliver food, supplies, and medical equipment to inaccessible areas. President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono cut short his time at the ASEAN and East Asia Summits in Hanoi to visit the disaster-struck area. He told survivors that the government's assistance was unyielding. Critics have blamed a dysfunctional German-made tsunami early warning system that was set up after the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami. Secretary Clinton has expressed her condolences for the loss of life and destruction in the islands and has noted that Americans are proactively providing humanitarian assistance and disaster relief with other partners in the region. Meanwhile, Java's Mount Merapi, one of Indonesia's most active volcanoes, erupted hot ash and debris, killing 34 people and displacing 50,000 people.

Cyclone Giri displaces thousands in Burma. Cyclone Giri hit Burma's western Rakhine state last week, destroying the major town of Kayaukpyu. According to the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA), at least 90 have been killed, 70,000 displaced, and 175,000 others impacted. With wind speeds up to 155 miles per hour, the storm was more powerful than Cyclone Nargis, which claimed around 140,000 lives in 2008. Aid groups, such Myanmar Red Cross and the Social Welfare Ministry, have set up temporary camps to shelter more than 5,000 people.

Flooding in Southeast Asia. As the monsoon season envelopes Southeast Asia, several countries have been ravaged by flooding and landslides. Thailand continues to suffer one of the worst floods in the nation's history, with94 people dead and 13,000 displaced. Authorities estimate 4.2 million people, mostly in the central and eastern areas, were affected by the flooding as their homes, farmland, and livestock were submerged. Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva promised that the flooding will not be allowed to reach Bangkok proper due to the city's importance as the nation's economic center. Heavy rains and flooding in central Vietnam's Nghe An, Ha Tinh, and Quang Binh provinces have left at least 66 dead and 17,000 households submerged in water.

CSIS Southeast Asia encourages our readers to support the recovery efforts by contributing using the following links to key relief agencies.

ASEAN

7th ASEAN-China Business and Investment Summit. China hosted the seventh China-ASEAN business and investment summit on October 19, 2010 in Nanning, capital city of Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region of China. A top Chinese political adviser reaffirmed at the summit's opening ceremony that "no matter how strong and powerful China can be, the country's policy of mutual trust, equal treatment, good-neighborhood, mutually beneficial cooperation, and common development would remain unchanged in developing relations with ASEAN countries." The leaders agreed to create a business advisory committee of 33 Chinese and ASEAN companies in January 2011 to provide private-sector guidance for ways to effectively expand trade and investment. ASEAN-China two-way trade reached $ 211.3 billion from January to September 2010, up 44 percent year-on-year, as the China-ASEAN Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) went into effect on January 1, 2010.

17th ASEAN Summit. ASEAN's leaders convened in Hanoi on October 28–30 for their 17th annual summit. They reviewed progress toward their collective goals for economic, political, and social integration defined in the ASEAN Charter (http://www.aseansec.org/21069.pdf). The leaders met amid growing confidence about regional recovery. The World Bank and IMF estimate the region's GDP will expand by 6.5 percent in 2010. The leaders also recognized the need to accelerate integration efforts as their partners from around the Asia-Pacific region have come to a consensus that ASEAN will be the core of new regional architecture for trade and security.

ASEAN currency coordination? In the context of continued global concern about currency valuations, ASEAN leaders discussed options for greater coordination on currency policies to prevent the decline of exports. Recognizing their limited influence in thecurrency drama being played out by the world's largest economies, ASEAN Secretary General Dr. Surin Pitsuwan suggested that the bloc boost regional demand and reduce reliance on U.S. and European markets. Malaysian prime minister Najib also urged ASEAN not to be distracted by the currency tension but to focus on greater trade links in the region. Indonesia, Thailand, and the Philippines are pushing ASEAN to adopt a common foreign-exchange position ahead of the G-20 Summit in an effort to prevent competitive devaluations among members. Indonesia is a member of the G-20, and Vietnam will represent ASEAN at the G-20 Summit in its current role as Chair of ASEAN.

ASEAN endorses connectivity plan. ASEAN leaders agreed on a "connectivity master plan" outlining strategies to improve the region's connectivity in three major areas: physical connectivity (transport and infrastructure), institutional connectivity (trade and investment liberalization), and people-to-people connectivity (tourism and education). The plan seeks to bridge the economic diversity in the region and help ASEAN achieve its goals of an integrated community in 2015. The plan also supports connectivity with the "Plus 3" partners in East Asia, China, Japan and South Korea. Those countries have provided financial support for several infrastructure projects in ASEAN counties.

ASEAN ministers call for agreement on climate change. On October 13, 2010, in Bandar Seri Begawan of Brunei the 12th Informal ASEAN Ministerial Meeting on the Environment called for a legally binding agreement to restrict global temperature rise to less than two degrees Celsius above the pre-industrial level, underlining the importance of reaching a climate change deal at the United Nations Conference on Climate Change (UNCCC) to be held in Cancun, Mexico, from November 29 to December 10. The Ministers urged developed countries to define "specific and binding targets" for cutting greenhouse gas emissions, and called on them to provide developing countries with "adequate, predictable, and sustainable" financial resources. Created under the ASEAN Charter, the ASEAN Climate Change Initiative (ACCI) serves as a regional platform to strengthen regional mitigation and adaptation efforts.

Burma not on the agenda, but discussed. Indonesia's foreign minister Marty Natalegawa announced that Burma's controversial election was "not officially scheduled" for the 17th ASEAN Summit. However, sources involved indicated that Burma and the elections were discussed in some detail during both the ministerial meeting and among the leaders. One outcome is that all resident ASEAN embassies in Burma will be invited to be "observers" for the election and will be allowed facilitated access to the election process "without restrictions." All ASEAN members indicated their interest in joining that effort. There were apparently indications that opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi could be released after the elections.

ASEAN + 3 summit concludes. ASEAN leaders met their dialogue partner counterparts from Japan, Republic of Korea, and China for the annual ASEAN + 3 Summit. At the meeting, Japanese prime minister Naoto Kan agreed to help to support the implementation of the newly adopted Master Plan on ASEAN Connectivity. ASEAN and South Korean leaders also agreed to elevate their cooperation to a strategic partnership by endorsing a Joint Declaration on Strategic Partnership for Peace and Prosperity, which is available on http://asean2010.vn/asean_en/news/48/2DAA0A/Joint-Declaration-on-ASEAN-REPUBLIC-OF-KOREA-strategic-partnership-for-peace-and-prosperity. ASEAN and China reaffirmed their commitment to comprehensive cooperation toward balanced and sustained development by adopting a Joint Statement on Sustainable Development, available on http://asean2010.vn/asean_en/news/48/2DAA0E/ASEAN-China-Leaders-Joint-Statement-on-Sustainable-Development.

China-Japan-ROK meeting in Hanoi. Leaders of China, Japan, and the Republic of Korea (ROK) met on the sidelines of the 17th ASEAN summit held October 28–30 in Hanoi. At the meeting, they agreed that their trilateral cooperation will not only serve the interest of the three nations but also contribute to boosting regional cooperation, peace, and stability in East Asia. Chinese premier Wen Jiabao underlined, "The correction direction of the tripartite cooperation should be firmly kept from a strategic perspective." China also pushed for completion of joint study on a China-Japan-ROK free trade area.

INDONESIA

President Obama's visit to Indonesia confirmed. The U.S. president will revisit the city where he spent several years of his childhood during his 10-day Asia tour and will formally launch the U.S.-Indonesia comprehensive partnership, which includes major initiatives in maritime security, counterterrorism, higher education, and climate change cooperation. Indonesia, nearly twice the size of the next largest member, will chair ASEAN and the East Asia Summit next year. It is also the world's fourth-largest country, third-largest democracy, and home to the largest number of Muslims in the world, though it is not an Islamic country. Strengthening ties with Indonesia is very important to the United States as it seeks to strengthen links with ASEAN and enhance the capacity and integration efforts among ASEAN members so the 10-country group will be a solid foundation for new regional security and trade architecture in Asia. On November 10, 2010, President Obama will deliver a speech at the Istiqlal Mosque, addressing Indonesians in a speech being described as building on the ideas in his Cairo speech in June 2009, where he called for "a new beginning" between the United States and the Muslim world. The president is likely to link the success of Indonesian and Malaysian Muslims to sustainable economic models and democratic governance structures. More analysis on the U.S.-Indonesia Comprehensive Partnership can be found on the cogitAsia blog here: http://cogitasia.com/2010/09/30/the-u-s-indonesia-comprehensive-partnership-the-security-component/)

Aceh terror suspect held in Malaysia. Indonesian authorities have confirmed that Taufik Marzuki, currently in Malaysian detention, is the terror suspect involved in the Aceh ideological and military training camp that police raided earlier this year. As a member of the Islamist Kumpulan Mujahiddin, he is thought to be involved in the Aceh terrorist network and has been on the police's wanted list since March 2010. In another example of outstanding transnational cooperation on counterterrorism in ASEAN, Taufik fled to Malaysia after the police raid and was arrested on September 29, 2010, by Malaysian authorities coordinating with their Indonesian counterparts.

Anti-government rallies in Jakarta. Marking the first anniversary of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono's second term, hundreds of protestors congregated outside the presidential palace, throwing stones and setting tires on fire, demanding that the president step down. The police resorted to firing tear gas and warning shots to disperse the crowd. Several smaller demonstrations occurred in other islands as well. The protestors indicated that they are dissatisfied with the president for not fulfilling his campaign promises concerning corruption, improvement of human rights, and economic recovery. More protests are planned in the near future.

APEC

Secretary Clinton to miss 2010 APEC ministerial meeting. Boasting an otherwise perfect attendance record on key Asian ministerial meetings, it appears the APEC ministerial meeting is one meeting too far for Secretary Clinton, who is covering seven countries on her current pan-Asian visit. She has asked Deputy Secretary of State Jim Steinberg to attend the 2010 APEC ministerial meeting on November 10 in Yokohama, Japan. President Obama will attend the 2010 APEC Leaders' Meeting on November 12–13 in Yokohama, but Clinton's absence does highlight the question of whether APEC will retain its prominence and relevance as other regional structures such as the East Asia Summit add the United States and Russia to their memberships.

APEC business leaders recommend free trade. The APEC Business Advisory Council, composed of representatives from business communities in each of APEC's 21 member economies, urged APEC leaders to speed up establishment of the free trade zone, known as Free Trade Area of the Asia-Pacific (FTAAP) to materialize trade liberalization in the region. In its proposal submitted to Japan, chair of the 2010 APEC Summit, the council made a reference to the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) as a model and argued, "FTAAP is an inspirational but achievable vehicle for delivering free and open trade and investment in the Asia-Pacific region." Recent research suggests that removing tariffs and implementing trade facilitation measures in an FTAAP would increase regional economic growth by 2.9 percent.

BURMA/MYANMAR

International community responds to elections in Burma. On October 27—less than two weeks before the national elections—Burmese foreign minister Nyan Win said that the military junta "will release Aung San Suu Kyi (ASSK) maybe after the elections." However, no date was specified. U.S. State Department spokesman Philip Crowley accused the military regime of "craven manipulation" of the elections by offering to release ASSK only after voting. He demanded Burma free all political prisoners immediately and allow Suu Kyi to participate in the elections. United Nations secretary general Ban Ki-Moon also called on Burma's Southeast Asian neighbors to act more aggressively in urging Burma to provide political space and free elections or risk tarnishing their own democratic credentials. Philippines' president Benigno Simeon Aquino III cited the exclusion of ASSK as a sign that the elections lack credibility. Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Vietnam issued a joint statement calling for free and fair elections. Australian prime minister Julia Gillard added her voice to the discussion by stating her concern with Burma's human rights violations.

Burmese General Than Shwe will not compete in the election. According to a Southeast Asian diplomat, Burma's general Than Shwe will not be running in the national election on November 7, 2010. The diplomat spoke on condition of anonymity. While it is widely believed that Than Shwe's name will not appear on the ballot during the elections, it remains unclear what role he will play in the country's political future.

THAILAND

Thai-Burma border closure during elections. Tighter restrictions have been placed on the shared border after reports of people being detained for attempting to place explosives at the Rangoon International Airport and other public buildings in Rangoon, Mandalay, and the federal capital Naypyitaw. The suspects are believed to have connections to the armed anti-government movements: All Burma Students Democratic Front (ABSDF) and Karen National Union (KNU), which are based near the border. Thai authorities say that the border will remain closed until November 14, 2010, one week after the elections in Burma.

Bangkok to vote on Cambodian-Thai border. Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva informed a group of Cambodian reporters in Bangkok that Thailand's National Assembly is set to deliberate on the minutes of a bilateral joint border committee (JBC) meeting between Thailand and Cambodia held on October 26, 2010. Negotiations of the JBC were suspended last year because the Thai parliament had not endorsed the agreed minutes. The documents stipulate joint demining and demarcation projects along the border near the Preah Vihear temple and redeployment of soldiers in the zone in order to diffuse border tensions. The parliament's approval will not only facilitate the JBC's future tasks but also expedite the resolution of long-standing disputes over the two countries' shared boundary. However, citing insufficient time, the parliamentary vote is reportedly suspended until next week.

Ties with Cambodia strained over DSI report. In mid-October, Thailand's Department of Special Investigation (DSI) disclosed a report claiming that militant "Red shirts" received special weapon training in Siem Reap, Cambodia. This bombshell accusation took place as relations between the two kingdoms were restored after their two premiers met in New York in September and in Brussels in October. Prime Minister Hun Sen of Cambodia rejected the allegation and argued, "Cambodia has [an] obligation to fight against terrorism and has no interest in interfering into the internal affairs of Thailand." Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva of Thailand, who was assured by the Cambodian leader's non-interference policy, warned the DSI to take 'extra caution' when making such a public statement.

VIETNAM

U.S.-Vietnam ties strengthened. During the 17th ASEAN Summit, U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton and Vietnamese foreign minister Pham Gia Khiem witnessed the signing of two cooperative agreements. The first is a contract for Vietnam Airlines to buy B787-9 aircraft from the U.S. Boeing Company; the second is a commitment between the Vietnam Ministry of Information and Communication and the U.S. Microsoft Corporation to improve Vietnam's information technology. Both countries also agreed to work on marine security and disaster relief. See Secretary Clinton's remarks with Foreign Minister Khiem here: http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2010/10/150189.htm.

Japan and Vietnam cooperate on rare earth metals and nuclear power. During the East Asia Summit in Hanoi, Japanese prime minister Naoto Kan and Vietnamese prime minister Nguyen Tan Dung agreed to cooperate in developing rare earth metals and building nuclear power. The two countries will conduct joint geological surveys of the rare earth minerals. Japan also agreed to build two of four nuclear power plants planned in Vietnam. These partnerships are seen as part of Vietnam's attempt to speed up resource development to meet the growing demand of its economy.

U.N. secretary general visits Vietnam for the first time. United Nations secretary general Ban Ki-moon made his first official visit to Vietnam on October 28–30, 2010. Ban met with President Nguyen Minh Triet and Communist Party general secretary Nong Duc Manh. He also attended the third ASEAN-U.N. Summit on October 29. During his meeting with President Triet, Ban congratulated Vietnam on its successes as ASEAN chair and its contributions to the implementation of the Millennium Development Goals. President Triet took the occasion to propose that the UN provide information and financial assistance to help Vietnam cope with climate change.

Should Vietnam continue its bauxite mining projects? Explicitly as a result of the massive toxic mud spill in Hungary in early October, a group of Vietnamese statesmen petitioned the government to close bauxite mines in Vietnam's central highlands. The petition was signed by 15 senior officials, including former Vietnamese vice president Nguyen Thi Binh. Together they called on the government to close the current mines and cancel all future operations. However, their concerns were dismissed by the Vietnam National Coal and Mineral Group (Vinacomin), which claimed that, unlike Hungary, Vietnam has plans to guarantee environmental safety. Also, if the projects are canceled, Vinacomin will suffer great losses because two-thirds of the investment has already been disbursed. Opposition to the mining deal sets a new benchmark in the role of nongovernment actors influencing decisionmaking in Vietnam. Among those opposing the deal is national hero and 97-year-old war veteran General Vo Nguyen Giap. He is joined by a wide coalition of Vietnamese citizens including bloggers and scientists. Some analysts believe that China's involvement in the deal—the deal involves the Aluminum Corporation of China (Chinalco)—is a contributing factor to the grassroots opposition.

Vietnamese government evaluates the near collapse of state-owned Vinashin. Vinashin, Vietnam's state-owned shipbuilding firm, was founded in 1996 and became one of the country's eight Economic Groups in 2006. It contributed more than $169.6 million to the government's budget by the end of 2009. However, in the last two years, the firm has incurred tremendous losses as a result of the global financial crisis. Instead of accurately reporting its deficit, Vinashin officials claimed to have earned $38.25 million in profit while actually losing $81.6 million. Because Vinashin is a state-owned company, the government plays a significant role in responding to this crisis. Vietnamese prime minister Nguyen Tan Dung attributed this situation to "managerial weakness, a lapse in responsibility, [and] deliberate violations and the falsification of financial reports...." Companies claimed that the government needs to increase controls on the way state-owned companies use their investment capital. The company's problems and its fate are an important harbinger of how the government will handle state-owned enterprises, address corruption, and manage the privatization process.

CAMBODIA

United Nations chief visits Cambodia. On his four-Asian-nation tour, UN secretary general Ban Ki-moon paid a three-day visit to Cambodia. In a meeting with the UN chief, Cambodian prime minister Hun Sen threatened to close down the local UN human rights office if General Secretary Ban does not replace the current UN human rights representative, Christophe Peschoux, who was accused of representing Cambodian opposition parties rather than working on human rights issues. On the Khmer Rouge tribunals, Hun Sen demanded that the UN-backed court must cease seeking new more indictments in order to maintain Cambodia's peace and stability. The premier asserted that additional prosecutions will "reopen old wounds and trigger another civil war" in his nation. Secretary Ban responded by defending the rights of the UN office head and underlining the importance of the court's independence. The UN chief also urged both Cambodia and Thailand to address their current border disputes through peaceful means.

Clinton to visit Cambodia from October 30 to November 1. U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton visited Cambodia, marking the third trip to Cambodia by top U.S. secretaries of state, namely Colin Powell in 2003 and Warren Christopher in 1996. Clinton's visit will coincide with the 60th anniversary of diplomatic relations between the U.S. and Cambodia. For more details on the trip: http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2010/10/150193.htm.The two countries cohosted "Angkor Sentinel" military exercises, held in July 2010 in Cambodia and attended by 26 countries. In October 2010, hundreds of Cambodian and U.S. sailors conducted a joint maritime security and security training exercise in Cambodia known as "Cooperation Afloat Readiness and Training Cambodia 2010." Clinton's trip is also seen as part of the U.S. effort to deepen its interests in Southeast Asia ahead of joining the East Asia Summit. During the visit, Secretary Clinton agreed to send U.S. experts to resume negotiations with Cambodia with a view to exploring ways to resolve the Cambodian debt issue. She also hinted, "The United States would be interested in seeing the money spent in Cambodia on improving education or environmental protection, instead of taking a direct payment."

SOUTH CHINA SEA

ASEAN and China will meet to discuss South China Sea. According to ASEAN secretary general Dr. Surin Pitsuwan, ASEAN and China will launch a working group meeting in December to prepare for a code of conduct to resolve the territorial disputes in the South China Sea. The meeting will be held in China. The ASEAN foreign ministers are keen to avert military conflict and strengthen confidence in the region. The code of conduct will implement the Declaration on Conduct of Parties in the South China Sea, which was signed in 2002 by all ASEAN member states and China. ASEAN and China have been unable to agree on implementing modalities for the past eight years.

Cambodia rejects internationalization of South China Sea. Cambodian prime minister Hun Sen recently urged all claimants to the South China Sea to use existing mechanisms to resolve the dispute through consultations and to fully adhere to the Declaration on Conduct in the South China Sea agreed in 2002. His statement is seen as action taken in response to a request from China. Cambodia, which itself is not a claimant, also urged some countries not to pressure China. In the 2002 declaration, ASEAN and China agreed to create a peaceful, friendly, and harmonious environment in the South China Sea with a view to promoting peace, stability, economic growth, and prosperity in the region. ASEAN and China differ on whether to resolve disputes multilaterally (the ASEAN view) or bilaterally (China's preference).

China expands naval fleet. Amid disputes with ASEAN members over the South China Sea, with Japan over the East China Sea (Senkaku and Diaoyu Islands), and with Korea related to North Korea's sinking of the Cheonan, China is expanding its fleet of naval surveillance ships. China launched a new high-speed inspection ship, and 36 more are expected to be added. The latest ship—China Marine Surveillance 75—would patrol the South China Sea. Beijing dismissed criticism suggesting the additional ships might be perceived as aggressive and explained that the ships will be used solely to protect its maritime rights.

MALAYSIA

Secretary Clinton to visit Kuala Lumpur. Secretary Clinton will be arriving in Malaysia on November 1. This is the first official visit to Malaysia by a U.S. secretary of state in 15 years. The three-day official visit to Malaysia, the longest leg of Clinton's Asia trip, is a reflection of the strengthening of ties between Malaysia and the United States. Secretary Clinton was scheduled to meet with Prime Minister Najib, but he came down with chicken pox on the last day of the ASEAN Summit and related summits in Hanoi, Vietnam. Clinton will meet with Malaysia's foreign minister, Datuk Seri Anifah Aman. A noteworthy feature of the visit will be the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding between the Malaysian Government and the United States on Science and Technology Cooperation During a briefing in Washington D.C., Assistant Secretary of State Kurt Campbell said, "Few countries have come as far, in terms of our bilateral relationship, as the one between the United States and Malaysia." Malaysia's efforts to strengthen ties are resulting in a warm embrace from Washington, D.C. The Clinton visit was in line with the commitment by U.S. president Barack Obama to elevate ties with Malaysia to a higher level during a bilateral meeting with Prime Minister Najib at the Nuclear Nonproliferation Summit in April 2010. Since then, Malaysia has sent military doctors and specialists to Afghanistan, strengthened its nonproliferation regime through passing the Security Trade Act, joined the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade negotiations, and is working closely with the United States on transnational issues such as climate change and counterterrorism.

By-elections in Sabah and Kelantan. Malaysia's Election Commission (EC) has set November 4, 2010, for two important parliamentary by-elections in Batu Sapi in Sabah and Galas in Kelantan. The elections are seen as an important referendum on Prime Minister Najib's leadership, specifically his reform efforts. Najib unveils Budget. Prime Minister Najib unveiled his 2011 budget on October 16, laying the roadmap for the country for the next few years. Among the highlights of the budget are plans to build another six highways and a 100-story tower, implementing a Mass Rapid Transit (MRT) transportation system in Kuala Lumpur, and Rural Basic Infrastructure (RBI) NKRA initiatives such as providing clean and treated water, electricity, and roads to improve the living standards of rural communities, especially those in Sabah and Sarawak. The Malaysian government also announced that it has achieved its budget target for the first time in three years and announced deficit reductions for 2011.

Indian prime minister visits Malaysia. As part of his "Look East" policy, Indian prime minister Manmohan Singh made a visit to Malaysia on October 26 on his way to the East Asia Summit in Hanoi. He met with Prime Minister Najib and discussed issues of economic integration and cooperation in the areas of infrastructure development, railways, knowledge industries, energy, defense, and greater people-to-people exchanges. The visit is expected to culminate in the signing of several pacts and the announcement of the conclusion of negotiations over an India-Malaysia Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement (CECA) that is expected to conclude early next year.

Malaysia urged to be firm in corruption fight. While Malaysia remained in the same spot as last year's on Transparency International's (TI) yearly corruption scale at 56th position, its corruption score dropped from 4.5 to 4.4. TI's corruption scale ranges from zero (perceived to be highly corrupt) to 10 (thought to have little corruption). Malaysia's 2010 target was to reach a score of 4.9. Although Prime Minister Najib has pledged to tackle corruption and introduced a series of reform measures, IT urged Malaysia to be firmer in fighting corruption. Paul Low, president of TI Malaysia, stated that for Malaysia to achieve its national target of high-income and developed nation status by 2020, it needs to maintain and enhance its commitment to fight corruption. Endemic corruption has hampered Malaysia's efforts to attracted much-needed foreign investment and has posed significant challenges for the country's overall economic development.

PHILIPPINES

Philippines in top 10 for gender equality. The World Economic Forum ranked the Philippines 9th among nearly 200 countries in gender equality in its 2010 Global Gender Gap Report, the highest ranking in Asia. the Philippines also ranked first on education and health in Asia, 13th on economic participation, and 17th on political empowerment. The report comes amid the debate over the passage of the Reproductive Health Bill, which has been staunchly opposed by the Catholic Church. The report quantifies equality in the areas of politics, education, employment, and health. The high ranking illustrates the improved status of Filipino women in society. Though discrimination still exists, more women than men are now enrolled in college, hold CEO positions at the top corporations, and practice previously male-dominated positions like law, medicine, and engineering in the Philippines.

Philippines to deepen cooperation with Vietnam. President Aquino will sign four landmark memorandums of agreement (MOAs) with Vietnam when he visits the country for the East Asia Summit. Aquino's visit is by invitation of Vietnamese president Nguyen Min Triet and is his first visit to an ASEAN country after his inauguration. The MOAs will focus on academic cooperation, defense cooperation, oil spill preparedness and response, and search and rescue at sea.

"PH" and "PHL" instead of "RP." The Department of Foreign Affairs has adopted "PH" and "PHL," which are the initials designated by the International Organization for Standardization (ISO), as the acronyms for the nation. The older "RP" is the acronym for Republic of the Philippines and has caused confusion with other countries. It is unclear if the names of treaties and government bodies using the initials "RP" would have to be renamed, such as the RP-U.S. Visiting Forces Agreement.

NEW ZEALAND

Pacific Partners: Washington Seminar. The CSIS study Pacific Partners: The Future of U.S.-New Zealand Relations is well under way. On Wednesday October 27, 2010, a U.S.-New Zealand expert seminar discussed and debated the first draft of the study. Nearly 30 experts offered their wisdom and expertise by giving commentary and feedback. The next review will be held in Wellington, New Zealand, on November 22, and the study will be finalized in January and published at the U.S.-New Zealand Partnership Forum in Christchurch in February 2011. It will lay out a series of research-backed recommendations for taking the United States and New Zealand to the next level. Prime Minister John Key and Foreign Minister Murray McCully will receive Secretary Clinton on Thursday November 4, 2010, in Wellington for her three-day visit and will sign the Wellington Declaration. U.S. assistant secretary of state Kurt Campbell stated that the declaration will underline the United States' desire to enhance U.S.-New Zealand cooperation on issues ranging from nuclear nonproliferation and climate change to stability in the Pacific Islands.

John Key attends the East Asia Summit. New Zealand's prime minister, John Key, has said the Burmese election was a step in the right direction, but not enough to satisfy New Zealand. Prime Minister Key said he would raise the issue with UN secretary general Ban Ki-Moon, who will be at the summit. For New Zealand's bid for a seat on the UN Security Council in 2015, Secretary Ban will also be invited to the Pacific Islands Forum to be held in Auckland next year. If he accepts, he will be the first UN secretary general to attend.

Trade deficit expands. Although New Zealand's exports increased recently, its strong domestic demand and currency caused import growth to rise faster. Increased purchases of cars and machinery contributed to the widening of this gap. The expansion of New Zealand's exports by 0.3 percent, or $2.3 billion, was the first time in four months and was concentrated in milk powder, butter, and cheese. Imports have increased by 3.6 percent, or $2.77 billion, and are led by purchases of vehicles, machinery, and equipment.

AUSTRALIA

Prime Minister Julia Gillard on the move. Prime Minister Gillard was in Hanoi this weekend for the Fourth East Asia Summit. Gillard indicated that in addition to the various security, political, and economic topics that will be discussed, she would take a strong position regarding upholding basic human rights in Burma. Following her trip, Prime Minister Gillard visited Indonesia and Malaysia and discussed human trafficking and asylum seekers. She will also have the opportunity to ask Indonesian president Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono for clemency for convicted Australian drug trafficker Schapelle Corby.

AUSMIN November 8, 2010. U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton and U.S. secretary of defense Robert Gates will participate in the 14th Australia-U.S. Ministerial (AUSMIN) on November 8, 2010. The AUSMIN is taking place after being postponed when Secretary of State Clinton needed to turn around en route to Australia due to the earthquake in Haiti in January 2010. Australia's foreign minister Kevin Rudd and defense minister Stephen Smith will host the consultations at Government House in Melbourne. This will be Secretary Clinton's first visit to Australia. AUSMIN is the premier forum for strengthening Australia-U.S. cooperation in the Asia-Pacific region and globally on foreign policy, defense, and strategic matters.

Afghan troops train with Special Forces. Six Afghan troops were flown to Australia to train alongside Australia's elite Special Forces. Air Chief Marshal Houston defends the decision but neither confirms nor denies reports the men are linked to Afghan warlord Matiullah Khan, who protects U.S. and Australian convoys in the Uruzagan province. This training program is seen as a calculated risk and a tactical decision that will be beneficial to security in the long run. Some critics say that the government needs to reveal the security process these men underwent before entering the country.

SINGAPORE

Indonesian haze plagues Singapore and neighbors. Illegal forest-clearing fires on Indonesia's Sumatra Island are sending haze across the Malacca Strait to neighboring Malaysia and Singapore, causing the worst air pollution since 2006. Singapore received a Pollution Standards Index reading of 72/100, considered to be in the moderate range. Singapore's Environment and Water Resources minister Yaacob Ibrahim noted that ASEAN environment ministers may need to conduct another meeting to discuss measures to combat the haze generated by uncontrolled forest fires on Sumatra. Environment ministers from ASEAN states had met in Brunei on October 13 to discuss national, subregional, and regional activities dealing with land and forest fires. Ibrahim noted that Singapore was disappointed at the recent turn of events and that Indonesia has been reminded several times to take more substantive action when tackling the issue of transboundary pollution.

Deputy prime minister steps down after 17 years. After leading a 24,000-strong home team for 17 years, Wong Kan Seng, Singapore's deputy prime minister for home affairs, announced October 27 that he would step down from his post. The Home Affairs Ministry oversees such departments and divisions as the Police Force, the Civil Defense Force, the Prison Service, the Internal Security Department, and the Immigration and Checkpoints Authority. Law minister K. Shanmugam, who was the second home affairs minister, took over from Mr. Wong on November 1, 2010.

LAOS

Laos and Thailand border demarcation. Following a three-year suspension, bilateral negotiations on border demarcation between Laos and Thailand are set to resume in January 2011. Laotian foreign minister Thounloun Sisoulit underlined the need for fully demarcated borders, creating a legacy for future generations and avoiding mistrust between the neighbors. Ninety-three percent of Cambodian-Laos borders have been officially demarcated.

Laos needs $15 billion to finance its development projects. In a recent meeting with its donor countries, Laos presented its national development plan to be implemented from 2011 to 2015. The five-year development strategy costs about $15 billion. The proposed sources of funding are as follows: 26 percent from foreign assistance, about 60 percent from foreign direct investment, 10 percent from domestic credit, and 10 percent from the national government. Donor countries agreed on October 21 to support the development compact, seeking $3.9 billion from external aid. The donors' main interests in Laos are promotion of equitable future growth and transparency in government's revenues.

Laos learns socialist modernization from China. The Communist parties of China and Laos cohosted the inaugural "socialist modernization" seminar titled "Major Theory and Practice in the Socialist Modernization Drive." China Communist Party member Liu Yunshan underlined the need to "strike a balance among reform, development, and stability, and create a favorable condition for the socialist modernization drive. China will continue to uphold the great banner of socialist development with Chinese characteristics, emancipate the mind, keep pace with the times, promote sound and fast social and economic development, and open up a new prospect in the socialist construction cause."

BRUNEI DARUSSALAM

Japan offers flood assistance for Brunei. Japan's ambassador to Brunei, Norike Hirose, suggested that Japan could potentially partner with Brunei to help develop infrastructure and to enforce effective methods for flood prevention. Ambassador Hirose noted that Japan had already developed the infrastructure necessary to deal with severe flooding, and that the Bruneian government could consider engaging the Japanese government on that level. Japan has developed an advanced rapid-response system and provisions for the control of extreme flooding.

China's Huawei to build broadband network in Brunei. Huawei, a Chinese telecommunications network solutions provider, announced it had been selected as the exclusive provider for the Brunei Next Generation Broadband Network (BNBN) project of Telekom Brunei Berhad. The project is the largest investment of its kind ever made by Telekom Brunei Berhad. BNBN will oversee the development of four major areas in Brunei.

MEKONG RIVER

MRC recommends postponing dam construction. According to a report commissioned by the Mekong River Commission (MRC), no dam should be built on the main stream of the lower Mekong River for the next decade. The report comes weeks after Laos formally notified its neighbors that it wants to build a major dam at Xayaboury near the border with Thailand. Weighing the potential risks and economic benefits, the MRC recommended deferring dam construction for the next 10 years. It cited the catastrophic consequences for fish stocks that could be caused by the mainstream dams.

Lower Mekong Initiative addresses climate change effects. On October 30, Secretary Clinton hosted a meeting with her counterparts from Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Vietnam to discuss plans for the Lower Mekong Initiative. They first addressed the potential impact of building dams on the Lower Mekong, then discussed ways to adapt to the effects of a changing climate and agreed to explore sustainable operating structures for the region.

Looking Ahead

U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton's Asian tour on October 27–November 9. Secretary Clinton visits Vietnam, China, Cambodia, Malaysia, Papua New Guinea, New Zealand, and Australia. The trip is characterized as "cool-headed, constructive diplomacy" with China and efforts to boost American ties with Pacific neighbors. The secretary's first trip as secretary of state was to the ASEAN region. She visited Indonesia and paid a courtesy call on ASEAN secretary general Dr. Surin Pitsuwan at the ASEAN Secretariat in Jakarta.

President Barack Obama's Asian tour on November 4–15, 2010. President Obama will make a state visit to India (November 5–9), formally launch the new Comprehensive Partnership with Indonesia

(November 9–10), participate in the G-20 Leaders' Summit in the Republic of Korea (November 11–12), and attend the APEC Leader's Summit in Japan (November 13–14).

25th Australia-United States Ministerial Consultations (2010 AUSMIN) November 8. The AUSMIN is the principal bilateral forum between Australia and the United States to discuss and share perspectives and approaches on major global and regional political issues and to deepen bilateral security and defense cooperation. Annually held in an alternate fashion, this forum is headed by both nations' defense and foreign ministers. This year, both Secretary Clinton and Secretary Gates will be in Melbourne. Their visit will also mark the 25th anniversary of the AUSMIN talks, launched in 1985, and 70 years of diplomatic relations between Australia and the United States.

G-20 Summit on November 11–12 in Seoul, Republic of Korea. The summit will discuss a broad range of issues including global economic recovery and measures to prevent "competitive devaluations" among its members amid foreign-exchange tension.

18th APEC Leaders' Summit on November 13–14 in Yokohama, Japan. President Barack Obama will attend this economic conference whose major focus will be achieving the "Bogor Goals," which called for industrialized member economies and developing members to achieve free and open trade by 2010 and 2020 respectively.

United Nations Climate Change Conference (UNCCC) in Cancun, Mexico, November 29–December 10, 2010.

Hu Jintao visit to Washington, Q1 2011. The United States and China have begun preparation for an official visit to the United States by President Hu Jintao in the first quarter of 2011. The visit could help ease regional tensions in Asia over perceived U.S.-Sino competition in a number of areas ranging from currency valuation to security-related issues in Southeast and Northeast Asia.

JERUSALEM (AP) - Israel's military says Gaza militants have fired a military-grade rocket into Israel, causing light damage and no injuries. Militants from inside Gaza regularly fire small rockets they manufacture themselves and only rarely use military-grade projectiles such as the relatively powerful Grad launched early on November 19. None of the armed groups in Hamas-ruled Gaza immediately claimed responsibility for the attack. An Israeli airstrike this week killed two senior members of one such group, the Army of Islam. Another faction released a video in Hebrew threatening retaliation for their deaths.

Given your recognition of the importance of procurement reform, I thought you might like to see that USAID is getting credit for making changes already. This is both the right thing to do and getting good press where it counts. AM

[redacted]

Dear Friends and Colleagues:

What if we told you a little-known bureaucratic process called "Implementation and Procurement Reform," IPR for short, was one of the biggest victories for poor people in years? It means more aid can go directly through a country's own systems, making them stronger. It also means that more aid will be administered by local organizations who know best what their own communities need.

Through IPR, USAID is putting President Obama's recent global development policy into action. The agency has set clear targets to increase use of local country systems and organizations, which means that US assistance will help citizens and their governments build their own capacity, instead of setting up a parallel system as they've done in recent years. They've set clear and ambitious targets for themselves that are laser-focused on results, and dedicated to fighting global poverty not just in the short term, but for good.

Ian Bray / OXFAM GB

This reform will likely be criticized by some who think that putting more money in the hands of local actors will expose USAID's programs to more risk. But this is precisely the point; only by supporting local change agents—both inside and outside developing country governments—can we actually strengthen the hands of people in poor countries who are working to change their own societies for the better. That means managing risk wisely, rather than trying to avoid it altogether. And in our field research, 36 of the 39 activists we interviewed said they want USAID to support their governments directly, because it would make it easier for them to hold their governments accountable and prevent corruption.

What does all this mean? It means better aid, aid that strengthens the capacity of reformers in poor countries. And for the millions of people across the world who have been demanding these reforms, USAID has shown it is actively listening.

Sincerely,

The Aid Effectiveness Team

Please pass to the Secretary

Madame Secretary,

I wanted to follow-up with you on my earlier note about the security situation in Monterrey. We have been working very closely with Pat Kennedy to assess all of our options. Pat has shown tremendous flexibility and has provided excellent counsel.

As we looked further into the Aug 20 shooting incident at the American School, it became clear that there many competing versions about the causes behind the incident. We decided that it is best to leave this matter to local law enforcement officials and to concentrate our review on whether it is possible to provide adequate security for the children of U.S. personnel in Monterrey.

Our discussions with police and other security officials made clear that local police and private patrols do not have the capacity to deter gangs and cartels from areas around the schools attended by the children of U.S. personnel. Local authorities, we found, are not able to respond in a predictable and effective manner to calls for assistance. Given the increasing level of violence that is occurring all over Monterrey, including near where our children go to school, we determined that the only immediate, practical, and reliable way to reduce the security risks for all children is to relocate them to the United States.

We are working with Pat Kennedy on the appropriate mechanism to formalize these arrangements. I have also advised Secretary Espinosa and Nuevo Leon Governor Medina that we are moving in this direction. In parallel with this, I recommitted to our Mexican counterparts that we will continue to do everything possible to support their efforts to improve the security environment in Monterrey and other parts of the country.

Thank you for your support on this matter.

Re: Post mid-terms strategy

What I hear from Republican sources and elsewhere and what it means for Republican strategy:

1. Rove is telling his donors that the ticket in 2012 is Romney/Barbour. Haley Barbour is Rove's ally. Together they constitute the heart of the GOP establishment. In a potential Republican administration Barbour would be a new kind of Cheney, but more politically skillful.

2. Rove is at war with Palin. He has told his donors she must be stopped. Palin is well aware. The Politico story filled with anonymous quotes about a murky establishment vs. Palin is about the Death Star of Rove/Barbour. Ironies: Rove doubled down on a base strategy for Bush, galvanizing the right wing, now spun out of his control to Palin. The GOP used the far right and Palin in the mid-terms and now have to kill them in presidential nomination politics. Attacking Palin only builds her stature with the right. She plays instinctively to the base, but can she play a long game against the big boys determined to destroy her?
3. Palin has already aligned Glenn Beck and Rush Limbaugh on her side. Fox News is being split. Murdoch gave his big donation to the Republican Governors Association, headed by Barbour.
4. Malcolm Hoenlein has been raising money hand over fist for the Republicans through Eric Cantor, now his vehicle. The donors are many of the same US donors to Bibi and Likud. Implications obvious.
5. The House Republicans have already planned to primary all Senate Republican moderates in the next cycle. Olympia Snowe is a particular target.
6. In the Senate, Jim DeMint continues to be a Fifth Column of the right, allied to the House Republicans, against remaining Senate GOP moderates. He will be reinforced after this election with Rand Paul, et al. Paul, of course, hates Mitch McConnell, and vice versa.
7. McConnell's statement the day before the mid-terms that the goal of the GOP is to make Obama a one term president is, in fact, their agenda. Everything in the House and Senate will be bent to that end.
8. Can the House Republicans and Senate Republicans restrain themselves in their own interest and McConnell's stated aim? Boehner is despised by the younger, more conservative members of the House Republican Conference. They are repelled by his personal behavior. He is louche, alcoholic, lazy, and without any commitment to any principle. Boehner has already tried to buy the members with campaign contributions and committee assignments, which he has already promised to potentially difficult members. His hold is insecure. He is not Gingrich, the natural leader of a "revolution," riding the crest into power. He is careworn and threadbare, banal and hollow, holding nobody's enduring loyalty. Boehner is beholden and somewhat scared of his base. He twitches when they make gestures that might undermine his position. His impulse is to hand out money. His aim is to recreate DeLay, Inc, with Jerry Lewis, who will be the new chairman of Appropriations. But Boehner is neither feared nor loved. He's a would-be DeLay without the whip. He's the one at the end of the lash. Which means he will be under great pressure and find it hard to sustain a moderate, reasonable strategy of restraint. McConnell is relatively in the same position in the Senate. On the other hand, the Congressional Republicans are vulnerable to a strategy that takes advantage of their internal divisions. Policies/tactics should be calculated to locate GOP fissures, find political space by widening schisms, and ultimately break them apart. This is, emphatically, not a strategy of bipartisanship as Obama has pursued it so far. It is a different and more informed approach.

7. McConnell's statement the day before the mid-terms that the goal of the GOP is to make Obama a one term president is, in fact, their agenda. Everything in the House and Senate will be bent to that end.
8. Can the House Republicans and Senate Republicans restrain themselves in their own interest and McConnell's stated aim? Boehner is despised by the younger, more conservative members of the House Republican Conference. They are repelled by his personal behavior. He is louche, alcoholic, lazy, and without any commitment to any principle. Boehner has already tried to buy the members with campaign contributions and committee assignments, which he has already promised to potentially difficult members. His hold is insecure. He is not Gingrich, the natural leader of a "revolution," riding the crest into power. He is careworn and threadbare, banal and hollow, holding nobody's enduring loyalty. Boehner is beholden and somewhat scared of his base. He twitches when they make gestures that might undermine his position. His impulse is to hand out money. His aim is to recreate DeLay, Inc, with Jerry Lewis, who will be the new chairman of Appropriations. But Boehner is neither feared nor loved. He's a would-be DeLay without the whip. He's the one at the end of the lash. Which means he will be under great pressure and find it hard to sustain a moderate, reasonable strategy of restraint. McConnell is relatively in the same position in the Senate. On the other hand, the Congressional Republicans are vulnerable to a strategy that takes advantage of their internal divisions. Policies/tactics should be calculated to locate GOP fissures, find political space by widening schisms, and ultimately break them apart. This is, emphatically, not a strategy of bipartisanship as Obama has pursued it so far. It is a different and more informed approach.

Bernard Avishai urges the Obama Administration to support the Arc on talkingpointsmemo.com

Friday, October 8, 2010 at 8:27PM

Yesterday Bernard Avishai, adjunct professor at Hebrew University, author of The Hebrew Republic, and a former editor of the Harvard Business Review, argued in Taking Points Memo:

"If President Obama is looking for a way to excite us with an American vision for a Palestinian state--one that can be started on even before core issues are (entirely) resolved, and which implies what is plausible about peaceful integration with Israel and Jordan--he could do worse than publicly get behind the RAND Corporation's ARC project."

Avishai acknowledges that the Arc leaves some contentious issues unresolved. "But," he challenges his readers, "I defy you to watch this short video and think about the state the same way again."

We offer the same challenge to you. Watch the video, and see if it changes the way you think about the possibility for a viable two-state solution. If it does, join FOTA, follow us on Facebook, spread the word to friends, and help the video go viral!

Re: Post mid-terms strategy

What I hear from Republican sources and elsewhere and what it means for Republican strategy:

1. Rove is telling his donors that the ticket in 2012 is Romney/Barbour. Haley Barbour is Rove's ally. Together they constitute the heart of the GOP establishment. In a potential Republican administration Barbour would be a new kind of Cheney, but more politically skillful.

2. Rove is at war with Palin. He has told his donors she must be stopped. Palin is well aware. The Politico story filled with anonymous quotes about a murky establishment vs. Palin is about the Death Star of Rove/Barbour. Ironies: Rove doubled down on a base strategy for Bush, galvanizing the right wing, now spun out of his control to Palin. The GOP used the far right and Palin in the mid-terms and now have to kill them in presidential nomination politics. Attacking Palin only builds her stature with the right. She plays instinctively to the base, but can she play a long game against the big boys determined to destroy her?
3. Palin has already aligned Glenn Beck and Rush Limbaugh on her side. Fox News is being split. Murdoch gave his big donation to the Republican Governors Association, headed by Barbour.
4. Malcolm Hoenlein has been raising money hand over fist for the Republicans through Eric Cantor, now his vehicle. The donors are many of the same US donors to Bibi and Likud. Implications obvious.
5. The House Republicans have already planned to primary all Senate Republican moderates in the next cycle. Olympia Snowe is a particular target.
6. In the Senate, Jim DeMint continues to be a Fifth Column of the right, allied to the House Republicans, against remaining Senate GOP moderates. He will be reinforced after this election with Rand Paul, et al. Paul, of course, hates Mitch McConnell, and vice versa.
7. McConnell's statement the day before the mid-terms that the goal of the GOP is to make Obama a one term president is, in fact, their agenda. Everything in the House and Senate will be bent to that end.
8. Can the House Republicans and Senate Republicans restrain themselves in their own interest and McConnell's stated aim? MIR ALI (AP) – Pakistani intelligence officials say suspected U.S. missiles have killed four alleged militants as they were driving in a vehicle near the Afghan border. The officials said unmanned drones fired two missiles November 19 on a vehicle near Marsi Khel village in North Waziristan. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to release the information. The strike is the ninth attack this month by unmanned drones in Pakistan's lawless border region, which is dominated by Taliban and al-Qaida-linked fighters.

Subject: (AP) Israel Says No Building Freeze In Jerusalem

JERUSALEM (AP) – Israel insisted November 18 it would keep building homes in disputed east Jerusalem, threatening to hold up a U.S.-proposed settlement construction moratorium designed to renew deadlocked Mideast peacemaking.

The contours of the moratorium deal, as presented by Israeli officials after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu returned from the U.S. last week, had appeared to be clearly agreed upon.

Washington, they said, had agreed to exclude the eastern sector of the holy city from the 90-day moratorium and there would be no further demands for construction curbs in the West Bank when the latest moratorium expired.

On November 18, however, a day after Netanyahu said a deal was imminent, the U.S. still had not sent a promised letter detailing the understandings on the proposed moratorium.

In Washington, a senior Obama administration official said the U.S. and Israel were still "haggling" over details of the written assurances. The official said most of the unresolved issues were relatively routine but added that it was unlikely that the letter would be finished Thursday.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the matter, said it was not clear when the letter might be completed.

In a speech November 18, Netanyahu suggested agreement was neither imminent nor inevitable.

He said he has been holding intensive contacts with the Obama administration since his meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton a week ago.

"The objective is to formulate understandings through which we can promote the political process while maintaining the vital interests of the state of Israel, primarily security," Netanyahu told students at the Technion, a technology school. "If I accept such an offer from the U.S. government I will bring it before the Cabinet and I have no doubt that my fellow ministers will accept it."

Earlier November 18, Netanyahu spokesman Mark Regev said any future moratorium would not apply to Jerusalem, whose eastern sector was annexed by Israel in 1967 in a move not recognized by the international community.

He noted that an earlier settlement slowdown, whose expiration in September led to the current impasse in peace efforts, did not include Jerusalem.

"Israel makes a clear distinction between the West Bank and Jerusalem," Regev said. "Jerusalem is our capital and will remain as such. The previous moratorium did not apply to Jerusalem ... If there is a future moratorium, it will similarly not apply to Jerusalem."

Palestinians want construction to halt in both areas, which they claim for their future state along with the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip. They have not said whether the partial freeze being brokered by the U.S. will be enough to draw them back to the negotiating table.

The negotiations broke down in late September - just three weeks after they began at the White House - following the expiry of a 10-month moratorium on new West Bank construction.

The U.S. hopes a renewed moratorium would allow Israel and the Palestinians to make significant progress toward working out a deal on their future borders. With borders determined, Israel could resume building on any territories it would expect to keep under a final peace deal.

To entice the Israelis to sign on to the deal, the U.S. has proposed a package of incentives including a gift of 20 next-generation stealth fighter planes and U.S. pledges to veto anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations, Israeli officials have said.

But Netanyahu has been having trouble winning support from the plan even from his coalition allies. The ultra-Orthodox Shas Party, which can make or break the deal, says it will let it go through only if Israel receives written assurances from the U.S. that the building restrictions exclude Jerusalem.

In a sign of the backroom dealings in Israel around the deal, an official close to Shas said the party had received assurances that if it abstains in the vote, Defense Minister Ehud Barak would authorize the construction of hundreds of apartments in the West Bank immediately after the moratorium expires.

Some of the construction would take place in specifically ultra-Orthodox communities and other projects would be built in a settlement just outside Jerusalem, giving Shas something to take back to constituents who might otherwise oppose another moratorium.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the deal has not been officially announced. The Defense Ministry did not reply to a request for comment.

Shas is critical to any moratorium deal because the inner Cabinet that will vote on it is almost evenly split, and Shas holds the two swing votes.

The party's spiritual leader, a 90-year-old rabbi known for his harsh comments about Arabs, will make the final determination on how to vote.

Thank you; We, group of women leaders met with Secretary Clinton. It was a short meeting, introduction and photo opportunity. But, I hope the event send a message to our government that women should be supported. I also think that the Embassy will consider more vision of women of Kosova.
Secretary Clinton was just remarkable. Her message for our, also Belgrade leadership was clear and strait forward; dialogue, dialogue, dialogue as two independent states!
The admiration expressed by the population in the streets as motorcade was passing, meeting with PM and acting President, open meeting with students and media was impressive. She is really inspiration for all.
Maybe was not a right time, but I only wish she has pressed the PM on corruption practices.
Thank you once again for facilitating this meeting.

Dear Melanne,

Hope this message finds you well.
I am trying to follow your work and every time I run into information that involves you as a speaker or presenter, I know that strong advocacy for the benefit of women is coming for the future.

I am starting a foundation, with a objective to advocate policies on health, environment and human rights. Women in the region have serious obstacles to access health care and services, and are suffering from a luck of information. Many preventable diseases are taking its toll because of the lack of information and facilities, especially regarding breast cancer and cervical cancer. Also, laws on health care do not require for preventive services such as mammography, pap smear and other preventive services. I am planning to work on different level, not excluding other target groups but starting with women.
Today, media have announce the visit of Secretary Hillary Clinton in the region, including Kosovo. Is there any chance to meet with her during short visit in Prishtina? I know she is coming to assist the dialogue between Prishtina and Belgrade, but she would be even more helpful if she meets me and other women.
New early elections are coming in few months and she would bust our confidence and would support better participation of women and better election result.
I am afraid that our government officials are going to meet alone and/or be very selective who can meet her because is going to have impact on the election.
I am not with any political party but would be wonderful and extremely helpful for the support of woman's agenda

Is any chance that you will be coming with Secretary Clinton?

Best regards,
Vjosa

LISBON (AP) - NATO will start drawing down its troops in Afghanistan next July and its combat role in the war-torn nation will end by 2014 or earlier so security can be turned over to the Afghans, a top alliance official said November 19. "We think that goal is realistic, and we have made plans to achieve it, but of course if circumstances agree, it could be sooner, absolutely," said Mark Sedwill, NATO's top civilian representative in Afghanistan. Sedwill said the troop withdrawal starting next year will be "shallow" and eventually accelerate but did not elaborate. NATO spokesman James Appathurai also said the alliance's 28 leaders, including President Barack Obama, were set to approve the withdrawal plan. He said NATO is "quite confident of the end of 2014 timeline for handing responsibility to Afghan security forces" as requested by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Appathurai and Sedwill did not say how many NATO troops would stay in Afghanistan after 2014 serving as military advisers and trainers.

http://maxblumenthal.com/2010/11/the-return-of-ghosts-debating-the-rise-of-geert-wilders-and-the-far-right/

The Return of Ghosts: Debating the rise of Geert Wilders and the far-right at the Nexus Symposium

On 11.18.10, By Max

The Nexus Institute's Return of Ghosts conference was inspired by the rise of far-right politician Geert Wilders in the Netherlands

I spent last week in Amsterdam, where I participated in the "Return of Ghosts" symposium of the Nexus Institute, a discussion/debate about the resurgence of neo-fascism in Europe and anti-democratic trends in the West. Besides providing a forum for debating European politics, the symposium was the occasion for the first public appearance in Europe by Peruvian writer Mario Vargas Llosa since he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature last month. The arrival of Vargas Llosa, one of the world's foremost intellectuals, resulted in an overflow crowd filled with members of the Dutch media, the country's political class, and the royal family.

Even with Vargas Llosa in the spotlight, the participants' attention was focused on Geert Wilders, the leader of the far-right Dutch People's Party for Freedom and Democracy, which is now the third leading party in the Netherlands. With his gathering influence, Wilders has essentially placed the Dutch coalition government in a stranglehold; the government meets with him every Wednesday to gauge his opinions and ask for his instructions. While Wilders dictates at will to the government, he remains independent of it, comfortably avoiding the consequences of policies he has helped to shape. It is the perfect position for a politician whose agenda is comprised exclusively of xenophobic populism, and typical strategy of the far-right in countries across the continent.

Wilders' base lies in the mostly Catholic south, where ironically few people have ever encountered a Muslim. He has also generated support in the city of Groeningen, once a citadel of the communists. Seeking to expand his base, Wilders promised to hire scores of "animal cops" to investigate and prosecute the abuse of animals, a clever wedge strategy in the only country I know of that has a party dedicated exclusively to animal rights. Of course, Wilders could care less about our furry friends. His stated goal is to end immigration not just to Holland but to all of Europe; ban the Quran (free speech is only for the "Judeo-Christian" community), and severely limit the rights of Muslim citizens of Europe by, for instance, instituting what he called a "head rag tax" on Muslim women. Wilders' international allies include the goosestepping neo-Nazis of the English Defense League, the far-right pogromist Pam Geller, the Belgian neo-fascist party Vlaams Belang, and a substantial portion of the US neocon elite. Over the course of just a few years, he has become perhaps the most influential Islamophobe in the world.

But does this make Wilders a fascist? Rob Riemen, the director of the Nexus Institute, thinks so. Riemen has just published a book entitled "De Eeuwige Terugkeer Van Het Fascisme," or "The Eternal Return of Fascism" (I eagerly await its English translation), dedicated to highlighting the danger of Wilders' eerily familiar brand of right-wing populism. In the book, Riemen urges readers to compare Wilders' politics to the early incarnations of European fascism, not to the genocidal terminal stage fascism of late World War II. He calls the parallels between Wilders and the early fascists "one-and-one." In an economic and civilizational crisis like the kind the Netherlands is facing, Riemen warns that reactionary figures like Wilders can easily seize power while centrist elements stand by politely and passively, refusing to call a spade a spade. Where Wilders' ascendancy will lead is unknown, but if he is not stopped in his tracks, Riemen is certain the story will not end well. In the week after its publication, Riemen's book flew off the shelves, selling 5000 copies while generating heated reactions from across the spectrum of debate.

Riemen told me that despite the public enthusiasm for his book, his characterization of Wilders has been attacked as "un-Dutch." In Dutch culture, as in so many others, open confrontation is avoided at all cost. Political disagreement is welcomed only if it is expressed in a collegial manner, as though nothing more than reputations were at stake. So the Dutch cultural elite generally goes along to get along. The resistance Riemen has met since he called Wilders out seemed to have alarmed and frustrated him. Why was it so difficult for liberal elements in the Netherlands to recognize the clear resonances of fascism in Wilders' political style? he wondered. And why did they seem more concerned with regulating the terms of debate than with forming a united front against the far-right? Once the symposium opened and I was able to see the Dutch elite in action, I began to understand Riemen's indignation.

The symposium began with a speech by Vargas Llosa, a complex personality who has allied himself with center-right parties in Spain and elsewhere but whose politics remain fundamentally rooted in cultural liberalism. Vargas Llosa's differences with leaders of the left, which he used to belong to, exploded over the issue of free trade. He is an ardent neo-liberal and reviles Latin populists like Hugo Chavez and Ollanta Humala who advocate protectionism and industrial nationalization.

Vargas Llosa decorated his speech with literary metaphors and natural imagery to describe the challenges of democracy, particularly in Europe. But the body of the address was devoted to the supposed threat Islamic extremism posed to Western civilization. Vargas Llosa singled out suicide bombing as the most dangerous phenomenon, pointing to the Madrid and London bombings by al-Qaida inspired operatives, while curiously not mentioning suicide attacks by secular groups like the Tamil Tigers and the Kurdish PKK, or the nationalistic suicide terror by Palestinian militants (Vargas Llosa declared in his speech that "Israel deserves to be treated like any other nation," and has been harshly critical of the state in the past).

During the first panel, which I participated in, Fania Oz-Salzberger, an Israeli professor of history and the daughter of famed author Amos Oz, boasted to crowd of Israel's "vibrant democracy." She was enthusiastically seconded by Mitchell Cohen, a former editor of Dissent who has devoted considerable energy to assailing anti-Zionist Jews, writing that "the dominant species of anti-Semitism encourages anti-Zionism." I found it odd that neither expressed any concern over the almost endless stream of anti-democratic laws passing through the Knesset, or by the general authoritarian, anti-liberal trend in Israeli society. Oz-Salzberger went on to announce to a smattering of applause that "Geert Wilders and politicians like him are not welcomed by Israelis."

Yet Wilders is one of Israel's most frequent guests, having visited the country over 40 times in 20 years. In fact, he claims that his views on Islam and Arabs were forged while living on an Israeli moshav. "Nowhere did I have the special feeling of solidarity that I get when I land at Ben Gurion airport," he once said. Wilders reportedly receives heavy support from Dutch financial backers of Israel, and has met with a range of Israeli officials. His closest allies lie within the extremist settler movement, prompting him to call for the forced transfer of Palestinians to Jordan. Members of the liberal Zionist intelligensia like Oz-Salzberger may not not want Wilders around, but who in Israel is listening to them? Israel's mainstream leadership echoes Wilders' crudest talking points on a regular basis, while the Zionist left clings to a dwindling handful of Knesset seats and watches passively — even resentfully — as a rag-tag band of leftist radicals fights for equality for all. Consider a recent statement by former Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who is seen as a centrist within the Israeli political spectrum: "The origin of terrorism is within Islam," Olmert declared this month.

The pro-Israel position of the new breed of European far-rightists has to be recognized as much more than a convenient political tactic. Of course, saying you "stand with Israel," as Wilders so often does, is an easy way to insulate yourself from charges of anti-Semitism. But the extreme right is also attracted to Israel because the country represents its highest ideals. While some critics see Israel as a racist apartheid state, people like Wilders see Israel as a racist apartheid state — and they like it. They richly enjoy when Israel mows down Arab Muslims by the dozens and tells the world to go to hell; they admire Israel's settler culture; and most of all, they yearn to live in a land like Israel that privileges its ethnic majority above all others to the point that it systematically humiliates and dispossesses the swarthy racial outclass. The endgame of the far-right is to make Europe less tolerant and more Israeli.

After the Italian philosopher Paolo Flores D'Arcais proclaimed that Italy was no longer a democratic country, citing PM Silvio Berlusconi's control over 90 percent of the country's media, the government's deep seated corruption and the Prime Minister's repeated attempts to impose onerous restrictions on journalistic freedom, Riemen asked me if the United States was a democracy given the the rapidly rising influence of corporations over the media and elections. After two panelists had described Israel as a vibrant democracy while another labeled Italy a non-democratic quasi-dictatorship, I decided that our definition of democracy was subjective at best. So I sidestepped the question and outlined a few of the greatest blows to American democracy, from the elimination of the Fairness Doctrine to the Telecommunications Deregulation Act to the Citizens United SCOTUS decision. Later in the evening, D'Arcais would remark to me with amazement that he never knew American media was ever regulated in the first place.

During the 20 minutes or so when students of Tilburg University were able to question the panel, one student asked whether suicide terror was a uniquely Islamic phenomenon, apparently referring to Vargas Llosa's address. I responded that it of course was not, citing the example of secular groups like the Tamil Tigers which brought the tactic into practice the second suicide. I recommended the audience review the research of Robert Pape, the University of Chicago political scientist who demonstrated a clear connection between the American and Israeli occupation of Middle Eastern countries and the motivations of suicide bombers. Oz-Salzberger jumped in, proclaiming that occupation has little or nothing to do with the motives of suicide bombers. She did not marshal any evidence to support her point, possibly because our time was so limited. It would have been hard to do so, however, without supporting the fundamental argument of Wilders about Islam's inherent violence — or the even sillier theory by the Israeli filmmaker/professional hasbarist Pierre Rehov that suicide bombers are motivated by sexual repression.

Next, the Dutch panel took the stage. The main attraction was Frits Bolkstein, the longtime leader of the People's Party for Freedom and Democracy who employed Wilders as his parliamentary aide, providing him a stepping stone to his political career. He was a silver haired curmudgeon from aristocratic stock who reminded me instantly of the "paleocon" characters I've met while covering white nationalist conventions like American Renaissance.

"Everything went wrong when the government became impressed in the 90's with the idea of the 'good stranger,'" Bolkstein declared. "If the previous governments had tightened their immigration laws, there would not have been a Mr. Wilders."

The only member of the panel to mount a significant challenge to Bolkstein was the Tilburg University professor Paul Frissen, who argued that the rule of law and basic standards of democracy protects "the right to be fundamentalist." The other panelists either gave Bolkstein's xenophobia a pass or attempted to surpass his resentment of Muslims. After Bolkstein lightly criticized Wilders' call for banning the Quran, remarking that "what he says about Islam is nonsense" because it contradicts the freedom of religion, AB Klink, a former Dutch senator and ex-Minister of Health, chimed in."It's not nonsense because Islam is so different in its cultural values than ours," Klink claimed.

Then, when Bolkstein called for shutting down Islamic schools, Frissen reminded him that state-supported Christian schools in the Dutch Bible belt teach theocratic concepts as well. Meindert Fennema, the political biographer of Wilders, entered the debate to demand that all religious schools be closed. "I'm against all forms of religious teaching!" he proudly exclaimed, sending gales of applause through the audience. "How can you call yourself a liberal?" Frissen asked with a tone of exasperation. Fennema ignored him.

During question time, a young freelance writer from India named Natasha Ginwala asked Bolkstein to answer for the "ghost of neo-colonialism," which "the African people never voted for." She mentioned the exploitative deals forced on developing countries by transnational oil companies, possibly alluding to Bolkstein's role as a manager at Royal Dutch Shell in authoritarian countries like El Salvador, Indonesia, and Honduras during the 1970's (I'm sure nothing unseemly happened during Bolstein's tenure in these places). Bolkstein's responded bluntly, "If these countries try to be self-sufficient it just doesn't work!"

After the symposium, I talked to Ginwala and a group of her friends, who were mostly immigrant students. They were appalled by the ignorance of the Dutch panelists. "None of them knew the first thing about Islam," an Arab student remarked. "They couldn't even pretend to understand what Muslims actually believe." Ginwala added, "How can Bolkstein tell me my country can't be self-sufficient? I come from India. It's one of the most diversified economies on the planet."

I was not in Amsterdam long enough to do any formal reporting. However, I did notice that all of the immigrants I spoke to were closely and nervously following the rise of the right. At the airport, while waiting to board my flight, I talked to a 20-something security guard named Muhammad who seemed almost as bored as I was. Muhammad had spent his whole life in Amsterdam, but his parents were from Cairo, Egypt. He told me he wanted to take his girlfriend on a trip to New York City and Miami someday. When I brought up the topic of Wilders, he scoffed at his perception of Muslims. "Most of us aren't even religious," Muhammad said. "When I hear him talking about Muslims wanting to take over, I just laugh. I'm like, is this guy serious?"

But he did not underestimate Wilders' appeal. "Everything he does and everything he says, it seems like it's carefully planned. He obviously knows what he's doing. And they let him get away with it," Muhammad remarked. "Look, I'm just a citizen, I'm nobody, but if I say something about Christians or Jews that the government doesn't like, I'll be punished. But when Wilders, who is a public official, says all the things he says about Muslims, nothing happens to him. Instead, more and more people are voting for him."

PARIS (Reuters) - An Iranian woman accused of adultery will not be executed November 3, France's foreign minister said, citing a telephone conversation with his Iranian counterpart. "Manouchehr Mottaki assured me that Iranian legal authorities had not yet reached a verdict in the affair relating to (Ashtiani) and that the information regarding her alleged execution did not correspond to reality," Bernard Kouchner said in a statement.

Elections

With some 20 seats still undecided, Republicans have already picked up 61 seats in House; Democrats likely to keep 51-53 seats in Senate. Spratt and Skelton losses are among more significant; H will prepare an analysis of election's impact on our oversight committees. Murkowski appears to be headed for historic write-in win; her support of Law of Sea and likely sympathy for New START will be good for us. Reid will likely return to Washington energized by win to pursue consequential lame duck session. Manchin and Kirk will take up their seats in the Senate this month; Rich suggests S calls to each to help lock in support for New START.

Other Congressional Issues

Tom Nides' prep going well, and he'll see SFRC members and Sem Gilibrand this week. Rich expects committee will vote him out during lame duck; still unclear if we'll get floor vote. An inter-agency team will brief the Hill this week on the President's Asia trip. Kerry will leave for the Middle East, including Syria, on Sunday.

Guantanamo Closure

DOJ is considering Harold's latest paper on the way forward.

Iran

Kouchner announced after conversation with Iranian FM Mottaki that adultery convict Ashtiani will not be imminently executed, as earlier reported. Jundullah designation being announced this morning.

India

Roemer and Blake making good progress on nuclear liability issue, but we are not yet ready to raise public expectations.

Marking a landmark moment for all

Daily Herald Editorial Board

Published: 8/26/2010 12:05 AM

Today marks a watershed moment in our nation's history.

Know what it is? Any plans to celebrate the occasion? Ninety years ago this day, the United States secretary of state signed into law the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution giving women the right to vote.

That significant moment in history securing that basic civil right for one of the two genders in existence came after a more than 70-year struggle that saw pioneering "radical" women jailed and physically abused as they fought for justice.

Ninety years ago today. Not all that long ago, really. We still have women among us who lived during a time when this basic but powerful activity was prohibited. Denied to their mothers and grandmothers, older sisters and aunts.

Illinois played a pivotal role in the struggle, and Illinois and suburban women continue to mark our history, politics and policy. And they should continue to by exercising their right, speaking out and working to change policies that affect us all.

Illinois did not allow women to vote in presidential and local elections until 1913 and, according to votingwomen.org, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin were the first three states to ratify the 19th Amendment on June 10, 1919.

From the start, Illinois and its suburbs have been home to pioneering women. Libertyville's Clara Colby is listed as the first woman to vote, having cast a ballot for a new town hall while, papers at the time reported, her husband stayed home to "scrub clothes in the laundry."

There is Jane Addams, the Cedarville, Ill., native social worker and suffragist who founded Chicago's Hull House and was one of the first women to win a Nobel Peace Prize.

And Illinois has elected 14 female members of Congress. The first was Chicago Republican Winnifred S. Huck, only the third woman elected to Congress, just two years after the 19th Amendment ratification. Huck was the first wife and mother elected to Congress. Republican Ruth Hanna McCormick worked as a Springfield lobbyist who helped pass the law allowing Illinois women to vote in some elections in 1913 before she moved on to Congress. Democrat Emily Taft Douglas, an early leader of the League of Women Voters and an internationalist who was the wife of former U.S. Sen.

Paul Douglas and a cousin to President William H. Taft, beat isolationist Republican Stephen Day in 1945, according to the Women in Congress website.

In more recent times, Rockford Republican Lynn Martin moved from Congress to Labor Secretary and Chicago Democrat Carol Moseley Braun became the first black woman in the U.S. Senate. Now, of course, we also have Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who hails from Park Ridge. In the suburban trenches all along the way, women have been leading and agitating for change. Former Democratic state Rep. Eugenia Chapman of Arlington Heights is credited with helping start community colleges in Illinois. Republican Giddy Dyer of Hinsdale joined her in supporting the Equal Rights Amendment and also passed DuPage County's first clean air ordinance. Chapman worked with Republican Virginia B. Macdonald of Arlington Heights to establish a women's center at Harper College. And on it goes.

Nice, you say, but big deal? Indeed, they were a big deal and, indeed, women shaping our lives still are a big deal. Men, can you imagine your life without women? Women, can you imagine your life without other women? American women have come a long way in 90 years and society is the better for it. Women vote in greater numbers than men and have for years, nationally and in Illinois. They very well can and should vote, write laws, lead and play even more influential roles in what the next 90 years, and beyond, may bring us all.

The spectre of a global food crisis has reared its head again. Soaring corn prices, which on Monday recorded their biggest one-day rise since 1973, have triggered fears of a return to the turmoil of 2007-2008. Far-reaching measures are needed to prevent a recurrence.

Rising prices over the last decade are in part the result of burgeoning demand from emerging markets such as China and India. The emergence of commodities as a distinct asset class has also put upward pressure on prices. Commodity index-fund investment has soared over the last decade. Non-food commodities, in particular metals, have been equally affected. Copper and tin prices hit record highs last week.

Shocks on the supply side, in particular adverse weather events, have also contributed. Droughts in eastern Europe and heavy rains in North America this summer sent grain and oilseed prices soaring.

In the long run the market is likely to respond to higher prices by boosting production. Increases in productivity and innovations such as genetically modified crops will help supply to catch up with demand, bringing food prices down to more affordable levels.

But governments need to do a better job of managing shocks when they occur – and in doing so must not suppress the price mechanism. Actions taken to alleviate shortages have often undermined production when it is most needed. Export bans, such as that introduced by Russia in August, discourage productive investment by denying producers the windfall of selling to international markets. Direct food aid does the same by undercutting farmers in developing countries.

A mechanism is needed to keep markets open during volatile periods, however politically difficult this is. Rich countries should also continue to replace food aid with development assistance that boosts agricultural productivity. Initiatives such as Hillary Clinton's Feed the Future programme, which aims to give small-scale farmers access to new technologies, are much needed.

Poor countries are not without remedy. Larger food reserves will help to relieve shortages. Investing in irrigation and other measures to improve land quality will accelerate productivity growth. Rich countries should help to finance such investments.

We are beginning to realise that the era of food surpluses has come to an end. How policymakers respond will determine whether the turbulence of recent months becomes a regular occurrence.

A poisoned process holds little hope
By David Gardner
Published: August 25 2010 22:46 | Last updated: August 25 2010 22:46

As the caravans of Middle East peace negotiators rumble into Washington next week for the umpteenth time, the pervasive cynicism and sense of deja vu all over again is overwhelming – and with good reason.

The Middle East peace process long ago turned into a tortured charade of pure process while events on the ground – in particular the relentless and strategic Israeli colonisation of occupied Palestinian land – pull in the opposite direction to peace. "We have all been colluding in a gigantic confidence trick," is how one Arab minister puts it, "and here we go again."

While many factors had combined to hand veto powers to rejectionists on both sides, the heart of the question remains the continuing Israeli occupation. It is essential to remember that the biggest single increase of Jewish settlers on Arab land – a 50 per cent rise – took place in 1992-96 under the governments of peace-makers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres at the high-water mark of the Oslo peace accords. Many Israelis will point to the perfidy of the late Yassir Arafat, who wanted to talk peace but keep the option of armed resistance dangerously in play. But what killed Oslo was the occupation. The second intifada that erupted a decade ago was essentially the Oslo war.

A decade on, the Israeli settlement enterprise has turned the occupied West Bank into a discontiguous scattering of cantons, walled in by a security barrier built on yet more annexed Arab land and criss-crossed by segregated Israeli roads linking the settlements. Last month, B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights group, published a study showing Israel has now taken 42 per cent of the West Bank, with 300,000 settlers there and another 200,000 in East Jerusalem. The siege of Gaza has turned that sliver of land into a vast, open-air prison.

The main feature of the present situation is the disconnect between the high politics of the utterly discredited peace process and these – in Israeli parlance – "facts on the ground".

At last month's White House summit, where Barack Obama and Benjamin Netanyahu massaged their long estrangement into a political armistice, the US president praised the Israeli prime minister as a leader "willing to take risks for peace". But there is no evidence for this whatsoever. True, in June last year, in response to Mr Obama's Cairo speech denying any legitimacy to Israel's settlements, Mr Netanyahu forced himself to utter the words "Palestinian state" – but he surrounded them with barbed-wire caveats that voided them of meaning.

Indeed, the words all sides use – peace, resolution, security, and so on – may be the same; but what each side means by them is different.

The mainstream Palestinian leaders, President Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad, the prime minister, and the Quartet made up of the US, the European Union, the UN and Russia, talk of a negotiated resolution. This means two states living in peace and security, and a Palestinian homeland on the 22 per cent of Mandate Palestine taken by Israel in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. East Jerusalem would serve as the capital of the West Bank and Gaza, with marginal land swaps to preserve some Israeli settlements near Jerusalem. But what does Mr Netanyahu mean?

He has been most clear on what he does not mean. For a start, he has set his face against any concessions on Jerusalem. He wants to keep most settlements except for the far-flung "ideological" ones and the 100-plus "outposts" established as pawns to be traded once the chess game began. His idea of a demilitarised Palestinian state is more like a sort of supra-municipal administration than a self-determined, independent government.

Will he surprise us, on the hackneyed Nixon and China principle that holds it is politicians of the right who most easily close difficult deals? There is little to suggest that.

The thinking of Mr Netanyahu, son of a celebrated promoter of Greater Israel, has always been profoundly irredentist. While his nationalist Likud faces the constraints of being in coalition with an assortment of ultra-rightist and ultra-orthodox parties as well as Labour, that was plainly his choice; the centrist Kadima party was (and remains) an alternative. To be fair, Israel's electoral system – with a low threshold for entry into the Knesset that makes multi-party coalitions inevitable – means lobbies such as the settlers can take the national interest hostage. But Mr Netanyahu magnifies this by his choice of partners and by diligently firing up the ultra-hawks in the pro-Israel lobby in the US.

As risks he has taken for peace, Exhibit A is the much-hyped moratorium on settlement-building, which expires next month and has, in any case, been speciously interpreted. While the bulldozers to build settlements have been idling, moreover, the bulldozers demolishing Palestinian homes have been roaring: the rate of demolition in and around Jerusalem has doubled this year, while the army has just razed the village of al-Farisiye in the Jordan Valley, in line with Mr Netanyahu's strategically obsolete obsession with keeping the valley as Israel's eastern border.

As diplomacy struggles to keep alive the viability of a two-state solution, three rival systems of control have crystallised in the occupied territories that would make up a future Palestinian homeland: the settlements; the crimped Palestinian Authority of Mr Abbas and Mr Fayyad; and then Hamas, which Israel and its Arab and western allies have tried and failed to marginalise. Time is short for a negotiated outcome; it may even have run out.

The outlines of a deal are clear, in the (Bill) Clinton parameters of 2000 and Arab Peace Initiative of 2002, endorsed by 22 Arab and 57 Muslim countries (as well as Hamas, as part of the 2007 Mecca accord). There has to be an end to the occupation, and the US and Quartet cannot just allude to this; they must demand it.

It's a very New York crowd and very Diane style event (i.e. unconventional) Last year, it was held in one of the big delegates' lounges at the UN and she redid all the chairs, etc in her patterns. The awards are all serious and DVF is the moderator. Each awardee receives 50K for her ongoing work. The event bears no resemblance to a typical foreign policy event, but if you were in NY, you could arrive for the awards and leave. I have no doubt you would be very warmly embraced and DVF and Barry are so fond of you. I would only do it if could be easily done.

Dearest Madame Secretary,

I am in Abu Dhabi, watching you on television with Prime Minister Natanyaou. You are looking so well ! You are more and more impressive...I am so proud of you !

We are planning our Women of the World Conference again for next March. On Saturday night, March 12th, I will be having the 2nd DVF Award at a dinner at the UN. 2 of the recipients will be women from Vital Voices, one will be voted by people on line and the fourth one is the special one give to formidable example of courage and leadership. Last year it was given to Ingrid Betancourt by Meryll Streep.

More than anything, I would love if you would be willing to accept that award. YOU are such an example of strength. leadership and spirit to all of us women.

Am I dreaming or would you be willing to accept it ?

Lots of love

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Senate confirmed Jacob Lew as director of the Office of Management and Budget after a Louisiana senator lifted a hold on his nomination. Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu had held up Lew's confirmation to protest the administration's six-month moratorium on deepwater oil and gas drilling in the Gulf. She said that "notable progress has been made" in her talks with the Interior Department and noted some permits have been issued in recent weeks. The nomination was confirmed by voice vote.

Maybe. And, of course, worth the effort. Without an effort, the two state solution is dead; if failed, on the other hand, also dead. Another idea, don't know if it can be made to work: How to introduce Israel entering the NPT and ending its nuclear ambiguity, which is its state policy, but which itself is the model for Iran now. Can this issue be used profitably in negotiations, a wild card, as it were? Can options be developed on whether it can, how it might work, potential effect on peace process? Israel's nuclear ambiguity policy is certainly a big issue coming given Iran. See below from Haaretz today:

Interview / Why Israel should end its policy of nuclear ambiguity

An interview with Avner Cohen, expert on nonproliferation issues and author of the forthcoming book "The Worst-Kept Secret: Israel's Bargain with the Bomb."

By Natasha Mozgovaya Tags: Israel news

Avner Cohen is a senior fellow of the James Martin Center for Nonproliferation Studies at the Monterey Institute of International Studies. He is the author of "Israel and the Bomb" and the forthcoming "The Worst-Kept Secret: Israel's Bargain with the Bomb."

Avner Cohen, you claim that the time has come for Israel to abandon its policy of nuclear ambiguity. Why now, and why would that be good for Israel?

"Nuclear ambiguity is a cornerstone of Israeli strategic thinking. It was born many years ago, and sealed as part of a comprehensive deal with the United States in 1969. It was appropriate at the time, but today, in my opinion, it is not just anachronistic, but foolish and anti-democratic. Even in realpolitik terms, it is an 'own goal' for Israel. In my view, it undermines genuine Israeli interests, including the need to gain recognition and legitimacy and to be counted among the responsible states in this strategic field."

Are you sure the pressure on Israel is so severe? If Israel is criticized over its nuclear program, it's usually marginal. The brunt of the criticism is over its treatment of the Palestinians.

"Israel received tacit consent for its nuclear program from the Western world because it appeared to be a small, just state surrounded by enemies, and the memory of the Holocaust was still fresh. Israel's image was different then.

"In the long term, the more Israel appears to reject peace and to be the one that opposes a two-state solution, the more it will be perceived as a regional bully that possesses nuclear weapons. So the world will be a lot less forgiving on the nuclear issue. The situation of ambiguity, in which you don't have real legitimacy, is not a good place to be."

The United States has called on Israel to join the nonproliferation treaty, but during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit to Washington, U.S. President Barack Obama said he recognizes the special nature of the threats Israel faces, and these threats warrant special security measures.

"The Americans want to appear just and fair because the issue is seen in Israel as completely sacred. They want to look as though they respect that. This agreement [with the U.S.] has been passed along from president to president, but I don't believe this issue is as sacred to Americans as it is to Israelis."

Do you give credence to the slippery slope theory, under which abandoning ambiguity would lead to demands that Israel disarm?

"Those are cliches used by the defense establishment. Nobody demands that Israel make such an announcement without first doing the preparatory work among its allies and the Arab states. This great fear of a slippery slope is ridiculous. Israel has its own interests; nobody can coerce it to do things."

What about the claim that ambiguity is what keeps the Arab states from feeling a need to launch an arms race against Israel?

"I don't dismiss that claim out of hand, and if, after study and thought, this fear turns out to be warranted, I would be prepared to wait. But in some ways, ambiguity is insulting to the Arabs. The claim you mention treats Arabs as though they were children: If they are told that Israel doesn't admit to it, that frees them of the need to deal with the reality. I believe the Arab countries don't want to play a game of make-believe, but rather want to discuss the topic directly and realistically."

You say, basically, that Iran is imitating Israel's nuclear behavior. That comparison would certainly rankle Israel supporters.

"But the way Iran has advanced toward nuclear capability is not via announcements and tests, but rather by rumors. It can even remain within the bounds of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. If that rankles anybody, let it rankle.

"If Iran is not attacked, it will want to achieve a status of ambiguity; I see this as nearly certain. The international community thus has another reason not to accept the idea of ambiguity as legitimate. The norm that a state with a nuclear weapon must say so clearly is part of the nonproliferation regime. The longer Iran continues down this path, the less patience the world will have for Israel."

How do you envision the scenario of 'coming out of the nuclear closet?'

"Censorship plays a very central role in the enforcement of nuclear ambiguity. So long as there is a [military] censor, it is very hard to alter ambiguity. If censorship didn't exist, Israeli newspapers would be able to write about the subject more openly.

"Another issue is the need for a law that addresses the nuclear topic. There is a Shin Bet [security service] law, but there is no law for the Mossad and no law for the Israel Atomic Energy Commission. This is a very problematic situation.

"On the international level, it's a sensitive subject that demands preparatory work. Ultimately, I see a political statement by Israel's government in which the prime minister would find the right way to put this subject on the table. He would talk about the historical background and the responsible way Israel has dealt with this topic. With a few rare exceptions, these weapons have no military use; Israel views them as a means of deterrence. I don't think Israel would need to go into detail regarding how many [bombs] it has or exactly what it has.

"Israel has a right to the bomb no less than New Delhi, or even the United States. Ambiguity creates a sense that we are sinners, as though we had done something so terrible that we can't tell the awful truth - and I don't think it is so awful. This is a country that the world has viewed as a nuclear state for a long time, and the time has come for it to say something positive on this huge, complicated and awe-inspiring topic...

"All these states are ultimately committed under the treaty they signed to achieve a world without nuclear weapons. Whether that will happen in our lifetimes I can't say."

You say ambiguity undermines Israeli democracy and prevents debate on matters of life and death, such as the question of whose finger will be on the button. Do you think the Israeli public is ready for such a discussion?

"There has been very little creative thinking in this area, and ambiguity is one of the stifling factors that have produced an unacceptable, closed culture incapable of creative thinking. Ambiguity's power derives from the fact that Israeli society accepts it, and it seems to the public that any attempt to deviate from it would cause serious damage to Israeli security.

"Ambiguity has created a public incapable of dealing with the topic, one that is afraid of it and prefers the issue to be handled by 'trustworthy hands' so that it does not have to take responsibility itself.

Ambiguity has created an ignorant, craven public which, in a certain sense, has betrayed its civic, democratic duties on this subject."

What's it like researching a topic nobody discusses?

"When I started studying this subject 25 years ago, I had the feeling I was entering a palace where nothing could be touched. It took me years to find the right way to handle the topic responsibly - from a researcher's perspective, not from the standpoint of someone who is directly involved in the matter.

Today I think it is possible to initiate a meaningful dialogue about concrete, real issues."

A poisoned process holds little hope

By David Gardner

Published: August 25 2010 22:46 | Last updated: August 25 2010 22:46

As the caravans of Middle East peace negotiators rumble into Washington next week for the umpteenth time, the pervasive cynicism and sense of deja vu all over again is overwhelming - and with good reason.

The Middle East peace process long ago turned into a tortured charade of pure process while events on the ground - in particular the relentless and strategic Israeli colonisation of occupied Palestinian land - pull in the opposite direction to peace. "We have all been colluding in a gigantic confidence trick," is how one Arab minister puts it, "and here we go again."

While many factors had combined to hand veto powers to rejectionists on both sides, the heart of the question remains the continuing Israeli occupation. It is essential to remember that the biggest single increase of Jewish settlers on Arab land - a 50 per cent rise - took place in 1992-96 under the governments of peace-makers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres at the high-water mark of the Oslo peace accords. Many Israelis will point to the perfidy of the late Yassir Arafat, who wanted to talk peace but keep the option of armed resistance dangerously in play. But what killed Oslo was the occupation. The second intifada that erupted a decade ago was essentially the Oslo war.

A decade on, the Israeli settlement enterprise has turned the occupied West Bank into a discontiguous scattering of cantons, walled in by a security barrier built on yet more annexed Arab land and criss-crossed by segregated Israeli roads linking the settlements. Last month, B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights group, published a study showing Israel has now taken 42 per cent of the West Bank, with 300,000 settlers there and another 200,000 in East Jerusalem. The siege of Gaza has turned that sliver of land into a vast, open-air prison.

The main feature of the present situation is the disconnect between the high politics of the utterly discredited peace process and these - in Israeli parlance - "facts on the ground".

At last month's White House summit, where Barack Obama and Benjamin Netanyahu massaged their long estrangement into a political armistice, the US president praised the Israeli prime minister as a leader "willing to take risks for peace".

But there is no evidence for this whatsoever. True, in June last year, in response to Mr Obama's Cairo speech denying any legitimacy to Israel's settlements, Mr Netanyahu forced himself to utter the words "Palestinian state" - but he surrounded them with barbed-wire caveats that voided them of meaning.

Indeed, the words all sides use - peace, resolution, security, and so on - may be the same; but what each side means by them is different.

The mainstream Palestinian leaders, President Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad, the prime minister, and the Quartet made up of the US, the European Union, the UN and Russia, talk of a negotiated resolution. This means two states living in peace and security, and a Palestinian homeland on the 22 per cent of Mandate Palestine taken by Israel in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. East Jerusalem would serve as the capital of the West Bank and Gaza, with marginal land swaps to preserve some Israeli settlements near Jerusalem. But what does Mr Netanyahu mean?

He has been most clear on what he does not mean. For a start, he has set his face against any concessions on Jerusalem. He wants to keep most settlements except for the far-flung "ideological" ones and the 100-plus "outposts" established as pawns to be traded once the chess game began. His idea of a demilitarised Palestinian state is more like a sort of supra-municipal administration than a self-determined, independent government.

Will he surprise us, on the hackneyed Nixon and China principle that holds it is politicians of the right who most easily close difficult deals? There is little to suggest that.

The thinking of Mr Netanyahu, son of a celebrated promoter of Greater Israel, has always been profoundly irredentist. While his nationalist Likud faces the constraints of being in coalition with an assortment of ultra-rightist and

To be fair, Israel's electoral system - with a low threshold for entry into the Knesset that makes multi-party coalitions inevitable - means lobbies such as the settlers can take the national interest hostage. Elections

With some 20 seats still undecided, Republicans have already picked up 61 seats in House; Democrats likely to keep 51-53 seats in Senate. Spratt and Skelton losses are among more significant; H will prepare an analysis of election's impact on our oversight committees. Murkowski appears to be headed for historic write-in win; her support of Law of Sea and likely sympathy for New START will be good for us. Reid will likely return to Washington energized by win to pursue consequential lame duck session. Manchin and Kirk will take up their seats in the Senate this month; Rich suggests S calls to each to help lock in support for New START.

Other Congressional Issues

Tom Nides' prep going well, and he'll see SFRC members and Sem Gilibrand this week. Rich expects committee will vote him out during lame duck; still unclear if we'll get floor vote. An inter-agency team will brief the Hill this week on the President's Asia trip. Kerry will leave for the Middle East, including Syria, on Sunday.

Guantanamo Closure

DOJ is considering Harold's latest paper on the way forward.

Iran

Kouchner announced after conversation with Iranian FM Mottaki that adultery convict Ashtiani will not be imminently executed, as earlier reported. Jundullah designation being announced this morning.

India

Roemer and Blake making good progress on nuclear liability issue, but we are not yet ready to raise public expectations.

Iraq

Press reports about Inspector General's report on mil-civ transition mistakenly suggest that State had been unaware of associated challenges.

Middle East

Saeb Erekat here today, and will be delivering public remarks. He'll meet George Mitchell tomorrow.

In Kosovo, crazy for the Clintons

By Mary Beth Sheridan
Washington Post Staff Writer
Wednesday, October 13, 2010; 9:41 AM

PRISTINA, KOSOVO- This poor, tiny corner of Europe turned into the Land of Clinton on Wednesday, with thousands of Kosovo residents turning out to greet Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and pay homage to her husband. Former president Bill Clinton is revered here for his role in ending the Yugoslav "ethnic cleansing" campaign of the late 1990s.

Arriving in Pristina, Clinton's motorcade slowed to a halt on the central Bill Clinton Boulevard, and she hopped out of her car to personally inspect an 11-foot gold statue of the former president. She waved and smiled as a crowd brandished American flags, applauded and chanted "Hill-a-REE!! Hill-a-REE!"

Above the little plaza, an image of Clinton grinned from a giant billboard. Hillary Clinton's face beamed from another billboard nearby, bearing the word "Welcome."

After posing for photos with the Bill Clinton statue, the secretary of state ducked into the Hillary boutique next door. As she emerged, a local reporter approached. "Do you like it?" the reporter asked, gesturing to the statue. "Your husband."

"Yes! And look, a store with my name," said the secretary of state, holding a shopping bag inscribed "Boutique Hillary."

Asked what she thought of Kosovo, Hillary Clinton replied, "I'm so glad to be back after 10 years. It's wonderful."

The chief U.S. diplomat was concluding a three-day Balkan tour that also took her to Bosnia and Serbia.

During her husband's administration, NATO bombed Yugoslavia to force it to end an "ethnic cleansing" campaign in Kosovo, a breakaway province largely populated by ethnic Albanians.

Kosovo declared independence in 2008.

Dear Richard:

B1
1.4(D)

In the past two months, the TAPI project has been resuscitated, largely due to Turkmen President Berdimukhamedov's personal outreach to his counterparts in Kabul, Islamabad and New Delhi. A "Heads of Agreement" for the project was recently signed, and there is a possibility that the heads of state of the four participant countries will meet in Ashgabat in December to give further political impetus to the project. As a result, the Asian Development Bank has now reengaged on the project, and has just agreed to fund technical assistance to the Afghan Ministry of Mines to assist in negotiations with the other TAPI partners.

I have met twice with Turkmen President Berdimukhamedov since August, and TAPI is at the top of his agenda.

We all recognize the significant hurdles that TAPI faces, both from a security and commercial standpoint, but we believe we should do what we can to encourage forward movement on the project.

I have also made General Petraeus aware of the above.

We'll let you know how this develops, and in the meantime, would be grateful for any thoughts or advice you might have on the project.

With best regards,
Dick

It was only a little over a year and a half ago that the Obama administration demanded a freeze on Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, including even the "natural growth" of existing settlements. At the time, the administration called settlement activity "illegitimate" and appeared ready to go to the mat with Israel to show just how strongly the United States believed that settlements impede peace.

But now, the administration says it is prepared to pay off Israel to freeze only some of its settlement activity, and only temporarily. For the first time in memory, the United States is poised to reward Israel for its bad behavior.

Here's the offer that Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is reported to have put on the table recently: The United States will provide a package of advanced weaponry and military assistance to Israel totaling several billion dollars, all in return for an Israeli commitment to freeze settlement construction for just three months, excluding construction in Jerusalem. During this period, the United States hopes Israel and the Palestinian Authority will negotiate an agreement on the final borders of a future Palestinian state. The Israeli cabinet is weighing the offer, having demanded a letter from Washington confirming the terms.

This is a very bad idea. And while Washington will almost certainly come to regret bribing Israel, Israel may regret receiving such a bribe even more.

Previously, U.S. opposition to settlements resulted in penalties, not rewards, for continued construction. Washington deducted from its loan guarantees to Israel an amount equivalent, dollar for dollar, to the money that Israel spent in the occupied territories. While it's true that the United States has turned a blind eye to indirect U.S. subsidies for Israeli activities in the territories - such as tax deductions for American organizations that fund settlements - the deal now being offered to Israel is of a totally different magnitude. If it goes forward, it will be the first direct benefit that the United States has provided Israel for settlement activities that we have opposed for more than 40 years.

It is not clear that Washington has thought through the implications. Will the United States similarly reward Palestinians for stopping their own bad behavior? Will Washington pay them to, say, halt the incitement against Israel and Jews in their public media and some educational materials - something that shouldn't have been going on in the first place? Will the rewards for Israel be automatically renewable? Meaning, if Israel is willing to continue the settlement freeze after three months, will another set of rewards be the price for that? And what about enforcement? Will the United States demand its money back if it learns about construction during the freeze, even if that construction was not authorized by the Israeli government?
The list of problems is so long that it would not be surprising if the administration were already experiencing buyer's remorse.

But the arrangement has an even more serious long-term implication, one that should worry Israel profoundly. If it goes through, this deal will shake the foundation of the U.S.-Israeli strategic partnership. Since the early 1980s, the two countries have cooperated closely on assessing Israeli security, and Washington has promised to ensure Israel's "qualitative military edge" over any combination of potential Arab adversaries.

This commitment has been insulated from the vicissitudes of politics and diplomacy. Whatever the state of U.S.-Israeli relations or the peace process, America's commitment to Israel's security has been manifest. Not so, if this deal materializes. By subjecting Israel's defense needs to the political demands of an American administration, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has done something quite dangerous for Israel - he has made those needs contingent, negotiable, optional. Israel's security requirements are now merely a bargaining chip with which to negotiate what Jerusalem will or will not do to advance the peace process.

Today, the United States has "purchased" a short-term settlements freeze; what will be for sale tomorrow? Conversely, how seriously should our defense planners and congressional budget watchers take Israel's arguments about its security needs when it is prepared to market different elements of its policy for another squadron of advanced aircraft? Does anyone really believe that there is a substantive connection between a three-month settlement freeze and Israel's professed need for more airplanes?

These short-sighted tactics will lead both the United States and Israel into a long-term bind. Washington will be left fending off a landslide of demands from others who hope to be rewarded for their bad behavior, to be paid for stopping what they should never have been doing. Israel, meanwhile, will be left struggling to explain how precious its settlements really are if a payoff - albeit a high one - is enough to see them frozen. And both countries will need a new rationale for the exceedingly high price of what Israel calls its security requirements, but which will now look more like poker chips used to secure American aid.

This bargaining exercise has been unseemly all along; if it proceeds, both sides will probably regret it. But the deal has not yet been sealed. And it is not too late to start over.

DUBLIN (Reuters) – Ireland's four-year plan to reduce its deficit will be published on November 23, ahead of any international financial aid package, the Irish Times reported, citing unnamed senior Irish officials. "The cabinet will meet November 21 to sign off on the 160-page document which charts how the state will reduce its outgoings," the Irish Times said, adding the publication date had been brought forward so it could be identified as a government-originated plan rather than one driven by Europe or the IMF. The Irish Times said a separate plan for restructuring the banking sector was also expected to be finalized November 20-21.

Mark,
You've probably heard that a bomb went off thisd morning in Laghman province, Aghanistan. The Governor of the province is in Madrid at the end of a one-week visit to Poland, Germany, and Spain.

His message has been of support for ISAF and international development, which is helping Afghanistan defeat the enemy, confront radical terrorists, and rebuild.

The Governor is considering release of a a statement from Madrid to news outlets this afternoon. We have offered assistance in reaching media. Will keep you posted.

Please share this info, as appropriate, with those who should know in the Dept.

FOR KABUL:
While it appears that Insurgents hoped to capitalize on the NATO summit to send a message, and likely chose Laghman because of it has been relatively peaceful and secure, this incident underscores the Governor's talking points that, while Laghman has been peaceful and made great progress on all fronts in the past 9 years, Afghanstan still needs security and development assistance to defeat the terrorists, who only bring destruction, fear, and oppression.

Subject: (AP) Bin Laden: Relief body needed for Muslim countries

CAIRO (AP) - Al-Qaida has released a new audio tape of Osama bin Laden in which the leader of the terror network calls for the creation of a relief body to aid Muslims harmed in natural disasters and wars. In a copy of the message, bin Laden also criticizes governments in Muslim countries for spending more money on armies than on their citizens. The bin Laden tape comes after similar messages from al-Qaida figures that accused the Pakistani government of failing to provide for its people after massive floods in the country killed hundreds and left some 8 million people homeless. The authenticity of the tape could not be immediately verified.

Subject: From Arturo - Correa Rescued in Ecuador

Madame Secretary: After a tense day in which President Correa was slightly injured at noon by rioting and striking police, and later was barred from leaving the hospital by the same, the army finally rescued him at 9pm last night. Some military units, including the Navy unit in Guayaquil appeared to support the police. The police also occupied the national congress. As the rescue took place, the head of the Ecuadoran Joints Chiefs of Staff issued a statement supporting the president, and noting that the armed forces respect the rule of law "in which the President [Rafael Correa] is the maximum authority of the three branches." Things are now calm.

Reaction in the hemisphere was one of deep concern. The OAS adopted a resolution; South American presidents at the call of UNASUR travelled to Buenos Aires and are likely to go on to Quito to support Correa. Several, including Garcia and Santos, called Correa. Zapatero also spoke with him. Moratinos tried to reach you at around 6pm last evening to convey that news, I took the call.

As you know, we issued a statement of support for Correa. I also gave an interview to CNN in Spanish, which was re-played frequently. I strongly recommend that you call Correa today to reiterate U.S. support for his government and to wish him well.

He will appreciate it but, more broadly, it sends a signal that the United States supports the constitutional order and rejects any attempt to undermine it. Chavez in Buenos Aires predictably declared that we were behind the unrest. We have prepared a call sheet for you.

Regards,

Arturo

KABUL (AP) - NATO said coalition forces accidentally killed three Afghan civilians and wounded four others in Kunar province in eastern Afghanistan. NATO said in a statement issued the incident occurred after coalition troops came under fire near the village of Tantil in Pech district. When coalition forces returned fire, three or four rounds landed short of the target area, near a village, killing and wounding the civilians November 19. NATO spokesman U.S. Army Col. Rafael Torres said the coalition does everything within its power to prevent civilian casualties in the course of operations, but in this case it failed. The coalition expressed condolences to the families.

RIYADH (AP) - A senior Saudi official says the kingdom's aged ruler will fly to the United States for "medical tests." The official says King Abdullah will leave the kingdom on November 22, three days after he was admitted to the hospital suffering from back pain due to a blood clot. The 86-year-old Crown Prince Sultan, who himself spent over a year in the U.S. and Morocco for medical treatment and recuperation, will arrive at Riyadh on November 21 to oversee the kingdom, the official said. The official spoke late November 20 on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press. The palace said November 19 that King Abdullah was hospitalized after a blood clot had created pressure on the nerves surrounding a ruptured disc.

Subject: (Jerusalem Post) PM: Cabinet to review US freeze deal when we get letter

(Jerusalem Post) Prime Minister Netanyahu met with Likud MKs and deputy ministers to discuss the U.S. proposal for a 90-day construction freeze, November 21. In the meeting, Netanyahu told the Likud officials: "I have a responsibility that includes making the best decision for the state of Israel and its national interests, foremost, its security." He continued, "We still haven't received the written agreement from the Americans on the basic understandings." The prime minister assured those attending the meeting, "If we receive a written agreement, I will bring it to the cabinet and I am sure that the ministers will approve it because it is what's best for the state of Israel." He added, "If we don't receive such a document, I won't bring the issue [of a freeze] to the cabinet."

Earlier in the day thousands of settlers protested outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem against the potential freeze. National Infrastructures Minister Uzi Landau, an opponent of an additional freeze, addressed the demonstrators. Dozens of youngsters also blocked the entrance to Jerusalem. Police dispersed the protesters and arrested two people. Over the weekend, Kadima MK Avi Dichter told The Jerusalem Post, "The total freeze for 10 months was a serious mistake," said Dichter. "It was clear that it would come to an end, and that in those 10 months nothing dramatic could happen between Israel and the Palestinians – leaving us in the same situation as at the beginning."

"Netanyahu made a second mistake when he didn't agree to the American request to extend a two-month freeze immediately on September 26, and insist that it was the last freeze. If he had, we'd be one week away from the end, rather than in our current state," he said. Dichter said the "main problem is that the topic of the freeze has become the central topic of discussion, rather than talks between us and the Palestinians.

MEXICO CITY (AP) - The American tourist who reportedly was shot and killed by Mexican pirates on a border lake may have been a victim of mistaken identity, a U.S. consulate official said October 14. "I think what you had is two innocent American tourists who mistakenly stumbled into a bad area and were pursued and the shooting occurred," said Brian Quigley, spokesman for the U.S. consulate in Matamoros, across the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Texas. Quigley was responding to a report by Stratfor, an Austin, Texas-based public policy research group that analyzes the Mexican drug war. The report suggested David and Tiffany Hartley might have been mistaken for drug runners and attacked.

Europe's New Politics of Fear

by Denis MacShaneApril 16, 2010

There is a new divide in Europe. Not an iron curtain, but an iron intolerance as politicians revert to blaming minorities for their nations' woes. In Western Europe it is Muslims. In Eastern Europe they are Jews, Roma, and gays. In the Netherlands, Geert Wilders surged to an election victory in March on the back of anti-Muslim, anti-Quran populism. In Hungary the Fidesz Party won big in recent elections with attacks on "Jewish capital...which wants to devour the entire world." To the right of Fidesz is the openly anti-Jewish Jobbik Party, which won just two seats fewer than the Socialists. Its leaders want to wear the neo-Nazi uniform of the pre-1939 Hungarian Guard when they take their seats in Budapest's Parliament.

Contemporary political scientists do not like to highlight anti-Semitism. They prefer the term "radical populism," but to anyone with half a sense of European history, the parallels with an older, Jew-baiting politics can no longer be dismissed. Economic dislocation and a rapid loss of confidence in traditional politics gave rise to ultranationalist movements in the first half of the last century. Now a global recession and the hunt for someone to blame as jobs and incomes disappear is producing the same toxic politics.

The Fidesz leader, Viktor Orban, was a youthful evangelist for liberalized open markets after 1990. Now he strikes a much more nationalist tone. His Socialist opponents had to accept an austerity IMF package. Unlike Greece—which is being helped, so far, by its euro-zone partners—Hungary was alone as boom-time euro loans to buy houses and cars had to be paid back in an ever-devaluing forint. Blaming the Socialist government, globalization, and international capital was easy. But Fidesz went further. In a bid for votes on the far right, a Fidesz parliamentarian, Oszkar Molnar, says it's time to give "primacy to Hungarian interests over those of global capital, Jewish capital."

Like Jean-Marie Le Pen's National Front in France, Jobbik has the support of about 15 percent of Hungarian voters. The Czech right-wing ODS Party has had to dismiss its leader, former premier Mirek Topolánek, after he attacked the Jewish origins of the current Czech prime minister and castigated the gay transport minister. In a new book, The Populist Radical Right in Poland, the Oxford-educated Warsaw political professor Rafal Pankowski writes: "Antisemitism is crucial to the Polish populist right. The number of Jews in Poland today is minimal, but the anti-Jewish prejudice serves as a code for a general hostility to diversity and to Polish [liberal] democracy." For the time being, criticism of nationalist politics is suspended as Poles mourn President Lech Kaczynski and other national leaders killed in the air-crash tragedy this month. But the record of his party activists—including Michal Kaminski, Poland's best-known M.E.P. and leader of a small right-wing group in the Strasbourg Parliament—is disturbing. An admirer of the late Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, Kaminski uses ugly language about gays, and says he will apologize for the killing of Jews on Polish soil in World War II when "Jews apologize for killing Poles."

Mainstream political parties have sought to play down the rise of minority bashing. But Fidesz is affiliated with the center-right European People's Party, which groups Angela Merkel's ruling Christian Democratic Union Party in Germany, Nicolas Sarkozy's Union for a Popular Movement government in France, and ruling conservative parties in Sweden, Italy, and Belgium. When Austrian rightist Jörg Haider entered a coalition in Austria a decade ago, the European Union held Vienna in a political quarantine until Haider was removed. But Fidesz has a massive majority built on attacking "Jewish capital" in language even Haider didn't dare utter.

So radical populism—anti-Muslim in Western Europe, anti-Jewish in Eastern Europe, and anti-foreigner and anti-immigrant rhetoric everywhere—is no longer fringe politics. In Britain's general election, all the main parties are seeking to appease anti-foreigner feeling with language on immigrants that they would not tolerate if applied to British citizens living and working abroad. Comparisons with prewar Europe should not be overdrawn. Fascism is dead and not coming back. But a new politics of intolerance is afoot in Europe, and no one knows how to deal with it.

What a Tea Party Looks Like in Europe

Marine Le Pen is moving her father's rabble-rousing, far-right party away from the fringe, and redefining French politics in the process.

by Tracy McNicoll and Christopher DickeySeptember 05, 2010

Samuel Bollendorff / The New York Times-Redux

Marine Le Pen is the heir apparent to the leadership of the National Front, the right-wing party her father Jean-Marie (left) leads today

Jean-Marie Le Pen, the 82-year-old firebrand of France's far right—the man who for decades has played on the inchoate fears, xenophobia, knee-jerk racism, and ill-disguised anti-Semitism of many of his supporters—had just finished speaking to the faithful on a farm not far from the English Channel. As members of the youth wing of his National Front party feasted on barbecue and apple pie, they were thrilled to see the grand old man hold forth, still the "provocateur" taunting the establishment, the "toreador" who hides the sword in his cape and lets the press run at him like a bull. Even these youngsters knew, however, that Jean-Marie's time in the ring is nearing an end. The old man himself made it clear he's determined to step down. All eyes this day were on his daughter Marine. "She has the will, the courage, the temperament necessary, and the competence," Le Pen told reporters at the farmhouse. "It seems to me indisputable that she is our camp's best candidate for 2012."

Tall, blonde, plain-spoken, and thick-skinned, Le Pen's youngest child, at 42, is the heir apparent to his party. She's expected to win the contest for its leadership in January, and she's a passionate advocate of its core message: strong French nationalism, relentless Euro-skepticism, and a lot of hard-nosed talk about fighting crime and immigration. She's a fresh face, a new look, and, with rising poll numbers placing her third in a crowded field of possible 2012 candidates, a new threat in French politics. In the eyes of many, she's more effective—and thus more dangerous—than her father.

It's a measure of the Le Pens' enhanced power that they've managed to push President Nicolas Sarkozy to the right and cast their own party as mainstream. Over the summer, Sarkozy essentially gave up his flirtation with the left, which began after his election in 2007. He had cherry-picked popular Socialists for his centrist government, dividing their party. But in elections this past March, Sarkozy's UMP party managed to keep control of only one out of 22 regional governments. So he decided to swing back to the right by playing on fears about public safety and immigration. He proposed taking citizenship away from some criminals of immigrant background and launched a campaign against Roma (or "Gypsies"), booting hundreds out of the country. While the measures proved popular in opinion polls, Sarkozy, ironically, did not. His abysmal approval ratings remain in the low 30s.

The younger Le Pen takes great pleasure in watching Sarkozy squirm. "I think I get on [his] nerves quite a bit," she says. "My profile is much more complicated for him to deal with than that of my father." The old man could be painted as a creature of the past, a purveyor of old prejudices with a "sulfurous" reputation, says Marine. Today, however, the Front wants to bill itself as "neither left nor right." If that means losing some fringe elements (many of whom support Marine's rival, Bruno Gollnisch), well, "tant pis," she says.

Other right-wing movements in Europe are also pushing into the political mainstream. The government of Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi in Italy has long relied on its alliance with two groups that used to be considered extreme—one of them the former Fascist Party under Gianfranco Fini, the other the secessionist Northern League of Umberto Bossi. A falling-out between Berlusconi and Fini has left Bossi as the current kingmaker in Italian politics. In the Netherlands, the militantly Islamophobic Geert Wilders won enough seats in the last elections to become a pivotal figure in the drawn-out process of trying to build a new coalition government.

Yet these movements often differ in significant ways from the right wing that's made in the U.S.A. Put aside the usual caricature of "people in pointy hoods and the Ku Klux Klan," Marine Le Pen says, and she still believes "the American right is much more to the right than the National Front." She might agree with those who want to manage American frontiers more effectively and prevent massive illegal immigration, but she's also a big believer in the state's ability and obligation to help its people. "We feel the state should have the means to intervene," she says. "We are very attached to public services à la française as a way to limit the inequalities among regions and among the French," including "access for all to the same level of health care."

Le Pen grew up in a household that was all politics all the time, with her father the object of sometimes violent attacks by competing factions on the right, as well as by the left. When Marine was just 8, someone set off a 20-kilo bomb in the family's Paris apartment building. Miraculously, no one was killed or seriously injured, but the front of the building was brought down. The crime has never been solved. "The worst part wasn't just the attack, it was that not a single politician sent a word of condolence," she says. "It was difficult, but it builds character, it hardens you."

That's a real asset in political life anywhere. If Sarkozy finds himself facing off against Marine Le Pen in the presidential race a year and a half from now, he may find himself wishing her old man had stayed around a little longer.

War on terror: Obama softened the language, but hardened Muslim hearts

The Obama administration's shift in counterterrorism language sought to bridge the divide with the Muslim world and soften Americans' fear of Islam. But the new rhetoric hasn't matched policy, and the unintended costs at home and abroad have been high.

By Stuart Gottlieb

New Haven, Conn. —
One of the most defining aspects of the Obama administration's counterterrorism strategy has been its effort to change America's rhetorical approach to the threat of terrorism, particularly Islamic terrorism. "The language we use matters," President Obama told the Arabic satellite television station Al Arabiya in an interview during his first week in office. Scrubbed were George W. Bush-era terms like "war on terrorism," "radical Islam," and "jihadist."The White House's 2010 National Security Strategy formally replaced the term "Islamic terrorism" with "violent extremism."
The purpose of the shift in semantics was two-fold.

First, it aimed to repackage the fight against terrorism as a specific fight against Al Qaeda, not against Islamic extremism, which Mr. Obama believes contributed to a post-9/11 perception that America was "at war with Islam." Indeed, the new rhetoric has gone hand in hand with Obama's outreach to the Muslim world to build "a new partnership based on mutual respect and mutual interest."
Second, it was part of a broader effort to soften Americans' fear of Islamic terrorism, which Obama officials believe plays directly into the hands of extremists.

Language change ineffective

Now it is fair to ask whether Obama's use of language regarding terrorism has proven effective. Startling new polls suggest it hasn't. The first, by the Brookings Institution in Washington, shows that between May 2009 and May 2010 the number of Middle Eastern Arabs expressing optimism in Obama's approach toward their region dropped from 51 percent to just 16 percent, with those describing themselves as "discouraged" by the Obama presidency rising from 15 percent to 63 percent.
The second, by the Pew Research Center, shows that in August 2010 fewer Americans held a favorable view of Islam (30 percent) than five years earlier during the Bush administration (41 percent), with more Americans (35 percent) saying Islam encourages violence more than other religions (in 2002, it was 25 percent).

These starkly negative trend lines suggest the limited utility of language in fighting terrorism. Yes, terrorism is a propaganda-fueled activity – an ongoing battle to win hearts and minds and attract new recruits to fight for the cause. And of course the language used in combating terrorism is vital – the counterproductive "smoke 'em out" rhetoric of the Bush administration is a case in point.
But if rhetoric does not match policy, or appears to discount or play down threats, the credibility – and thus effectiveness – of the overall counterterrorism strategy may be undermined. It appears the Obama administration has dug itself into just such a hole.

Rhetoric doesn't match policy

When looking beyond the nuanced language and appealing promises, what Muslims around the world see is an administration that has ramped up the war in Afghanistan; is killing scores of Muslim civilians with drone strikes; continues to hold more than 1,000 Muslim detainees in Guantánamo, Bagram, and other prisons; and maintains seemingly unconditional support of Israel.
This is not to critique these policies, but to point out that they do not match the raised expectations of the Muslim world and have only muddled Obama's oft-stated goal of turning Muslims toward America and away from extremist movements.

The price of downplaying the threat

A large price is also being paid domestically for disconnected rhetoric. Despite maintaining nearly all of Bush's hard-line tactics – the USA Patriot Act, warrantless surveillance, indefinite detentions – the White House has consistently played down the threat, even in the face of a clear uptick in terrorism activity.

For example, following the failed 2009 Christmas Day airline bombing, Obama described the suspect as an "isolated extremist," despite his ties to Al Qaeda. And the administration's initial response to the failed May 2010 Times Square bombing by an American Muslim trained in Pakistan was to call it a "one-off" event. Attorney General Eric Holder stated in congressional testimony that he believed these and other recent Islamic terror plots were unconnected, and unrelated to radical Islam.

There is little doubt that the administration's unwillingness to speak candidly about Islamic terrorism has taken a toll on the public's trust. A Gallup poll released last month shows Americans favoring Republicans over Democrats on the issue of terrorism 55 percent to 31 percent – up from 49 percent to 42 percent last fall.

Time to reverse the trend

Obama entered office promising to fight a smarter and more effective war on terrorism, and in many ways he has. His instincts to maintain aggressive tactics while toning down inflammatory rhetoric were sound. Yet his administration seems to have overlearned a key lesson of the Bush years – that overstating the threat of terrorism has costs attached. So, too, does rhetoric that understates the threat, especially when detached from policy.

It is not too late to reverse this troubling trend. The White House can begin by focusing less on overly reassuring rhetoric – which has not paid dividends at home or abroad – and more on a candid accounting of the threats faced and the policies employed to confront them.

With settlement deal, U.S. will be rewarding Israel's bad behavior

By Daniel Kurtzer
Sunday, November 21, 2010;

It was only a little over a year and a half ago that the Obama administration demanded a freeze on Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, including even the "natural growth" of existing settlements. At the time, the administration called settlement activity "illegitimate" and appeared ready to go to the mat with Israel to show just how strongly the United States believed that settlements impede peace.

But now, the administration says it is prepared to pay off Israel to freeze only some of its settlement activity, and only temporarily. For the first time in memory, the United States is poised to reward Israel for its bad behavior.

Here's the offer that Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is reported to have put on the table recently: The United States will provide a package of advanced weaponry and military assistance to Israel totaling several billion dollars, all in return for an Israeli commitment to freeze settlement construction for just three months, excluding construction in Jerusalem. During this period, the United States hopes Israel and the Palestinian Authority will negotiate an agreement on the final borders of a future Palestinian state. The Israeli cabinet is weighing the offer, having demanded a letter from Washington confirming the terms.

This is a very bad idea. And while Washington will almost certainly come to regret bribing Israel, Israel may regret receiving such a bribe even more.

Previously, U.S. opposition to settlements resulted in penalties, not rewards, for continued construction. Washington deducted from its loan guarantees to Israel an amount equivalent, dollar for dollar, to the money that Israel spent in the occupied territories. While it's true that the United States has turned a blind eye to indirect U.S. subsidies for Israeli activities in the territories - such as tax deductions for American organizations that fund settlements - the deal now being offered to Israel is of a totally different magnitude. If it goes forward, it will be the first direct benefit that the United States has provided Israel for settlement activities that we have opposed for more than 40 years.

It is not clear that Washington has thought through the implications. Will the United States similarly reward Palestinians for stopping their own bad behavior? Will Washington pay them to, say, halt the incitement against Israel and Jews in their public media and some educational materials - something that shouldn't have been going on in the first place?

Will the rewards for Israel be automatically renewable? Meaning, if Israel is willing to continue the settlement freeze after three months, will another set of rewards be the price for that?

And what about enforcement? Will the United States demand its money back if it learns about construction during the freeze, even if that construction was not authorized by the Israeli government?

The list of problems is so long that it would not be surprising if the administration were already experiencing buyer's remorse. But the arrangement has an even more serious long-term implication, one that should worry Israel profoundly.

If it goes through, this deal will shake the foundation of the U.S.-Israeli strategic partnership. Since the early 1980s, the two countries have cooperated closely on assessing Israeli security, and Washington has promised to ensure Israel's "qualitative military edge" over any combination of potential Arab adversaries.

This commitment has been insulated from the vicissitudes of politics and diplomacy. Whatever the state of U.S.-Israeli relations or the peace process, America's commitment to Israel's security has been manifest. Not so, if this deal materializes. By subjecting Israel's defense needs to the political demands of an American administration, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has done something quite dangerous for Israel - he has made those needs contingent, negotiable, optional. Israel's security requirements are now merely a bargaining chip with which to negotiate what Jerusalem will or will not do to advance the peace process.

Today, the United States has "purchased" a short-term settlements freeze; what will be for sale tomorrow? For that matter, how seriously should our defense planners and congressional budget watchers take Israel's arguments about its security needs when it is prepared to market different elements of its policy for another squadron of advanced aircraft? Does anyone really believe that there is a substantive connection between a three-month settlement freeze and Israel's professed need for more airplanes?

These short-sighted tactics will lead both the United States and Israel into a long-term bind. Washington will be left fending off a landslide of demands from others who hope to be rewarded for their bad behavior, to be paid for stopping what they should never have been doing. Israel, meanwhile, will be left struggling to explain how precious its settlements really are if a payoff - albeit a high one - is enough to see them frozen.

And both countries will need a new rationale for the exceedingly steep price of what Israel calls its security requirements, but which will now look more like poker chips used to secure American aid.

This bargaining exercise has been unseemly all along. If it proceeds, both sides will probably regret it. But the deal has not yet been sealed. And it is not too late to start over.

(Jerusalem Post) Prime Minister Netanyahu met with Likud MKs and deputy ministers to discuss the U.S. proposal for a 90-day construction freeze, November 21. In the meeting, Netanyahu told the Likud officials: "I have a responsibility that includes making the best decision for the state of Israel and its national interests, foremost, its security." He continued, "We still haven't received the written agreement from the Americans on the basic understandings." The prime minister assured those attending the meeting, "If we receive a written agreement, I will bring it to the cabinet and I am sure that the ministers will approve it because it is what's best for the state of Israel." He added, "If we don't receive such a document, I won't bring the issue [of a freeze] to the cabinet."

Earlier in the day thousands of settlers protested outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem against the potential freeze. National Infrastructures Minister Uzi Landau, an opponent of an additional freeze, addressed the demonstrators. Dozens of youngsters also blocked the entrance to Jerusalem. Police dispersed the protesters and arrested two people. Over the weekend, Kadima MK Avi Dichter told The Jerusalem Post, "The total freeze for 10 months was a serious mistake," said Dichter. "It was clear that it would come to an end, and that in those 10 months nothing dramatic could happen between Israel and the Palestinians – leaving us in the same situation as at the beginning."

"Netanyahu made a second mistake when he didn't agree to the American request to extend a two-month freeze immediately on September 26, and insist that it was the last freeze. If he had, we'd be one week away from the end, rather than in our current state," he said. Dichter said the "main problem is that the topic of the freeze has become the central topic of discussion, rather than talks between us and the Palestinians.

TEHRAN (AP) - Iran set a February 6 trial date for three Americans arrested more than a year ago along the Iraqi border and charged with spying, their lawyer said. The trial was to have started on Nov. 6, but authorities said they delayed it because one of the Americans, who was freed on bail, had not been summoned to return to the country to appear in court. Their lawyer said he received an official notification of the new trial date November 21. Iran warned that it will seize the $500,000 bail posted by released hiker Sarah Shourd if she does not return for trial. Shourd has not disclosed any plans to return to Iran. She said in an interview published Oct. 31 in The New York Times that the three stepped off an unmarked dirt road and inadvertently crossed from Iraq only because a border guard of unknown nationality gestured for them to approach.

New Haven, Conn. —

One of the most defining aspects of the Obama administration's counterterrorism strategy has been its effort to change America's rhetorical approach to the threat of terrorism <http://www.csmonitor.com/USA/Politics/2009/0129/obama-redefines-war-on-terror> , particularly Islamic terrorism. "The language we use matters," President Obama told the Arabic satellite television station Al Arabiya in an interview during his first week in office. Scrubbed were George W. Bush-era terms like "war on terrorism," "radical Islam," and "jihadist." <http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/0901/p03s03-uspo.html> The White House's 2010 National Security Strategy formally replaced the term "Islamic terrorism" with "violent extremism."

The purpose of the shift in semantics was two-fold.

First, it aimed to repackage the fight against terrorism as a specific fight against Al Qaeda, not against Islamic extremism, which Mr. Obama believes contributed to a post-9/11 perception that America was "at war with Islam." Indeed, the new rhetoric <http://www.csmonitor.com/World/Global-News/2009/0604/in-france-obama-erases-the-us-vs-them-rhetoric> has gone hand in hand with Obama's outreach to the Muslim world <http://www.csmonitor.com/World/Middle-East/2009/0605/p06s01-wome.html> to build "a new partnership based on mutual respect and mutual interest."

Second, it was part of a broader effort to soften Americans' fear of Islamic terrorism, which Obama officials believe plays directly into the hands of extremists.

But if rhetoric does not match policy, or appears to discount or play down threats, the credibility – and thus effectiveness – of the overall counterterrorism strategy may be undermined. It appears the Obama administration has dug itself into just such a hole.

Rhetoric doesn't match policy

When looking beyond the nuanced language and appealing promises, what Muslims around the world see is an administration that has ramped up the war in Afghanistan <http://www.csmonitor.com/USA/Politics/2010/0609/Obama-wants-more-money-for-Afghanistan-war.-Will-Congress-grant-it> ; is killing scores of Muslim civilians with drone strikes <http://www.csmonitor.com/World/terrorism-security/2010/0915/US-drone-attacks-bombard-Haqqani-network-in-Pakistan> ; continues to hold more than 1,000 Muslim detainees in Guantánamo <http://www.csmonitor.com/USA/Topics/Guantanamo> , Bagram, and other prisons; and maintains seemingly unconditional support of Israel.

This is not to critique these policies, but to point out that they do not match the raised expectations of the Muslim world and have only muddled Obama's oft-stated goal of turning Muslims toward America and away from extremist movements.

> Madame Secretary: After a tense day in which President Correa was slightly injured at noon by rioting and striking police, and later was barred from leaving the hospital by the same, the army finally rescued him at 9pm last night. Some military units, including the Navy unit in Guayaquil appeared to support the police. The police also occupied the national congress. As the rescue took place, the head of the Ecuadoran Joints Chiefs of Staff issued a statement supporting the president, and noting that the armed forces respect the rule of law "in which the President [Rafael Correa] is the maximum authority of the three branches." Things are now calm.
> Reaction in the hemisphere was one of deep concern. The OAS adopted a resolution; South American presidents at the call of UNASUR travelled to Buenos Aires and are likely to go on to Quito to support Correa. Several, including Garcia and Santos, called Correa. Zapatero also spoke with him. Moratinos tried to reach you at around 6pm last evening to convey that news, I took the call.
> As you know, we issued a statement of support for Correa. I also gave an interview to CNN in Spanish, which was re-played frequently. I strongly recommend that you call Correa today to reiterate U.S. support for his government and to wish him well.
> He will appreciate it but, more broadly, it sends a signal that the United States supports the constitutional order and rejects any attempt to undermine it. Chavez in Buenos Aires predictably declared that we were behind the unrest. We have prepared a call sheet for you.

November 22, 2010 - American Voters Could Deny Obama Reelection, Quinnipiac University National Poll Finds; President Tied With Romney, Huckabee But Leads Palin

Word format

President Barack Obama does not deserve a second term, American voters say 49 - 43 percent, and he is in a statistical dead heat with possible Republican challengers Mitt Romney and Mike Huckabee, according to a Quinnipiac University poll released today. President Obama leads Sarah Palin 48 - 40 percent.

Romney, Huckabee, Palin and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich are bunched together when Republican voters are asked who they prefer for the GOP's 2012 presidential nomination, the independent Quinnipiac (KWIN-uh-pe-ack) University survey finds.

Democratic voters say 64 - 27 percent they do not want anyone to challenge President Obama for their party's nomination in 2012.

"The Democratic base remains squarely behind President Barack Obama when it comes to his re-election, but his weakness among independent voters at this point makes his 2012 election prospects uncertain," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

"The demographic splits in the electorate when voters are asked whether the president deserves a second term is a roadmap for his re-election strategists on how they need to focus their appeal. Only 39 percent of men, 34 percent of whites, 35 percent of political independents and 38 percent of those over age 35 think he deserves four more years in the Oval Office."

In trial heats for 2012, former Massachusetts Gov. Romney receives 45 percent to 44 percent for Obama, while the president gets 46 percent to 44 percent for Mr. Huckabee. Matched against Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels, a virtual unknown to most voters, the president leads 45 - 36 percent.

"At this point, former Alaska Gov. Palin runs the worst against President Obama. Daniels is essentially a generic Republican because of his anonymity to most voters. Obama only gets 45 percent against him while he gets 48 percent against Ms. Palin," said Brown. "She is very unpopular among independents and although she recently said she thought she could defeat Obama, the data does not now necessarily support that assertion."

"Unlike Daniels, who is a political unknown to most Americans, virtually all voters have formed an opinion about Palin and that opinion is not encouraging for her candidacy."

Ms. Palin is viewed the most negatively by the American people of the possible Republican candidates in 2012. She is viewed unfavorable by 51 percent of voters and favorably by 36 percent. Among independents, the key swing voting bloc, she has a negative 54 - 33 percent favorability rating.

Huckabee gets a 41 - 25 percent favorability rating and Romney gets a 38 - 26 percent score. Former U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich gets a negative 30 - 43 percent score.

Obama gets a 48 - 48 percent split overall, with a negative 43 - 52 percent among independent voters.

In a mythical Republican primary Ms. Palin gets 19 percent, including 25 percent of GOP women, followed by Romney with 18 percent, Huckabee at 17 percent, Gingrich at 15 percent, Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty at 6 percent and Daniels, Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour and Sen. John Thune of South Dakota at 2 percent each.

"The best thing Obama has going for him when it comes to his re-election may be that at this point the Republicans don't have a candidate who is both nationally well-known and well- liked by a majority of voters," said Brown.

From November 8 - 15, Quinnipiac University surveyed 2,424 registered voters nationwide, live by telephone, with a margin of error of +/- 2 percentage points.

The Quinnipiac University Poll, directed by Douglas Schwartz, Ph.D., conducts public opinion surveys in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Florida, Ohio and the nation as a public service and for research. 1. (Republicans and Republican Leaners) It is a long way off but I would like to ask you some questions about the 2012 Presidential election. If the 2012 Republican primary for President were being held today, and the candidates were: Sarah Palin, Mike Huckabee, Newt Gingrich, Mitt Romney, Mitch Daniels, Tim Pawlenty, Haley Barbour, and John Thune for whom would you vote?

Subject: From Arturo - Correa Rescued in Ecuador

Madame Secretary: After a tense day in which President Correa was slightly injured at noon by rioting and striking police, and later was barred from leaving the hospital by the same, the army finally rescued him at 9pm last night. Some military units, including the Navy unit in Guayaquil appeared to support the police. The police also occupied the national congress. As the rescue took place, the head of the Ecuadoran Joints Chiefs of Staff issued a statement supporting the president, and noting that the armed forces respect the rule of law "in which the President [Rafael Correa] is the maximum authority of the three branches." Things are now calm.

Reaction in the hemisphere was one of deep concern. The OAS adopted a resolution; South American presidents at the call of UNASUR travelled to Buenos Aires and are likely to go on to Quito to support Correa. Several, including Garcia and Santos, called Correa. Zapatero also spoke with him. Moratinos tried to reach you at around 6pm last evening to convey that news, I took the call.

As you know, we issued a statement of support for Correa. I also gave an interview to CNN in Spanish, which was re-played frequently. I strongly recommend that you call Correa today to reiterate U.S. support for his government and to wish him well.

He will appreciate it but, more broadly, it sends a signal that the United States supports the constitutional order and rejects any attempt to undermine it. Chavez in Buenos Aires predictably declared that we were behind the unrest. We have prepared a call sheet for you.

Regards,

Arturo

LONDON (Reuters) – U.S. General David Petraeus, the commander of U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, said NATO-led forces had facilitated the passage of a senior Taliban commander to Kabul to hold talks with the Afghan government. Speaking to an audience in London, Petraeus said the move was part of U.S. and NATO support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai's reconciliation discussions with the Taliban. "In certain respect we do facilitate that, given that, needless to say it would not be the easiest of tasks for a senior Taliban commander to enter Afghanistan and make his way to Kabul if ISAF (International Security Assistance Force) were not....aware of it and therefore allows it to take place," he said. "That's about as far as I can go on that at this point."

Pat, through 8/25 for the Pakistan Flood Relief:

1. Have received $30,590 in pledge funds from texting all at $10 each so 3,059 pledges
2. Have received $178,922 in credit card donations from 2,050 donors
3. Have received $ 6,105 in ACH donations from 85 donors
4. Have received $19,565 in mailed in checks from 119 donors

So in total we have received $235,182 in pledges and donations from 5,313 donors

On average this is about $44 per donation/pledge. If you excluded the ten dollar pledges/donations the average donation was $163 dollars.

USGLC Looks Forward to Working with the 112th Congress to Protect National Security

Washington, DC— The U.S. Global Leadership Coalition today released the following statement from Executive Director Liz Schrayer on the preview of the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review:

"As part of the USGLC's Impact '08 initiative, a bipartisan working group of foreign policy experts called on the next administration to conduct a Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review. We believed such a review was a vital step in modernizing our civilian-led tools of global engagement, and we congratulate Secretary Clinton and Administrator Shah for tackling this monumental and necessary task.

"The preview of the QDDR released last week represents a bold step towards implementing a smart power foreign policy by elevating our civilian power and ensuring effective, results-driven programs. While we have not seen the full report and expect varying views on some of the recommendations, the initial outline includes several significant highlights that are essential for America to meet today's global challenges: Increasing the resources and human capacity for State and USAID; reinstituting budget and planning authority for USAID; and putting in place monitoring and evaluation efforts with clear metrics and a guarantee of program transparency.

"Today's global threats require the use of a wide range of tools, and the QDDR can help ensure our international affairs programs continue to make a critical impact in advancing our national security and economic intersts."

The U.S. Global Leadership Coalition (www.usglc.org) is a broad-based influential network of 400 businesses and NGOs; national security and foreign policy experts; and business, faith-based, academic and community leaders in all 50 states who support a smart power approach of elevating diplomacy and development alongside defense in order to build a better, safer world.

Hearing from some sources that Anwar Ibrahim has linked to AQ financiers. Apparently the Saudis are onto this and showed the US a dossier about this. Do you know anything about it? Is this the real reason why her meeting with him was cancelled?

QDDR Marks Bold Step Forward in Strengthening America's Civilian Power

Washington, DC— The U.S. Global Leadership Coalition today released the following statement from Executive Director Liz Schrayer on the preview of the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review:

"As part of the USGLC's Impact '08 initiative, a bipartisan working group of foreign policy experts called on the next administration to conduct a Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review. We believed such a review was a vital step in modernizing our civilian-led tools of global engagement, and we congratulate Secretary Clinton and Administrator Shah for tackling this monumental and necessary task.

"The preview of the QDDR released last week represents a bold step towards implementing a smart power foreign policy by elevating our civilian power and ensuring effective, results-driven programs. While we have not seen the full report and expect varying views on some of the recommendations, the initial outline includes several significant highlights that are essential for America to meet today's global challenges: Increasing the resources and human capacity for State and USAID; reinstituting budget and planning authority for USAID; and putting in place monitoring and evaluation efforts with clear metrics and a guarantee of program transparency.

"Today's global threats require the use of a wide range of tools, and the QDDR can help ensure our international affairs programs continue to make a critical impact in advancing our national security and economic intersts."

The U.S. Global Leadership Coalition (www.usglc.org) is a broad-based influential network of 400 businesses and NGOs; national security and foreign policy experts; and business, faith-based, academic and community leaders in all 50 states who support a smart power approach of elevating diplomacy and development alongside defense in order to build a better, safer world.

Subject: (AP) Officials think bin Laden involved in Europe plot

WASHINGTON (AP) – Osama bin Laden emerged October 1 as possibly a key figure in the European terror plot, and officials said he may be flexing his muscles in a move to show a besieged al-Qaida remains strong and able to launch major attacks on western targets. U.S. counterterrorism officials said they believe that senior al-Qaida leaders, including bin Laden, were involved in the plan to strike several European cities in a coordinated assault. If bin Laden had a direct hand in the planning, it would be the most active role he has played in a terror plot since the 9/11 attacks, according to U.S. officials and analysts.

Counterterrorism officials said that they are now working under the assumption that bin Laden played a role in the plotting, but they would not detail what indications they've seen that led them in that direction.

Still, some also believe that bin Laden's orders may have been delivered by one of his top commanders, since the al-Qaida leader is known to avoid close contact with anyone except his closet confidants.

While bin Laden's name is still a powerful reminder of the World Trade Center's twin towers and the Pentagon engulfed in flames, U.S. officials have for months asserted both in private and in hearings on Capitol Hill that his core al-Qaida group is weakened, struggling to raise money and attract recruits.

"Clearly there is a great deal of pressure on al-Qaida to do something to show that it is still alive and kicking," said Richard Barrett, the head of a U.N. group that monitors the threat posed by al-Qaida and the Taliban. "They need to show they're strong, they're a force multiplier, that they've still got some beef, that they've got operators abroad, that they can do things."

Barrett said al-Qaida's Pakistan-based network has not launched a successful attack since the London subway bombing in 2005. "In order to attract the younger new recruits, I think they have to do a bit better than that," he said.

The multi-pronged scope of the emerging terror plan _ which aimed to launch coordinated shooting rampages or attacks in Britain, France and Germany _ is an al-Qaida hallmark.

U.S. officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters, declined to reveal what evidence they have that bin Laden took a more prominent role in this plan. And one U.S. intelligence official cautioned that the details of how the plan was directed or coordinated by the group's core leaders is not yet clear.

The involvement of bin Laden and his devoted leaders, believed to be in hiding in Pakistan, underscores continuing U.S. concerns about that country's role as a safe haven for al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists.

And it reflects al-Qaida's persistent effort _ through video and online messages _ to inspire its followers to wage attacks against the West. The threat to Europe was highlighted when bin Laden issued a call to arms in March 2008 after a Danish newspaper printed controversial cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad.

He warned Europeans in an audio message that there would be a "severe" reaction to come.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., the senior Republican on the House Intelligence Committee, said that bin Laden may simply be trying to re-exert himself. And his role in the European plot could suggest a lack of confidence by al-Qaida central in the ability of other affiliated groups in Yemen or Africa to carry out a successful attack on their own, Hoekstra said.

Over the past year, several terror attacks in the U.S. have either failed or been foiled, including the botched attempts to bring down a Detroit-bound airliner on Christmas Day and to set off a bomb in New York's Time Square.

"They've let other people take the lead on attacking the West," said Hoekstra, adding that bin Laden may now be thinking, "these guys can't do it, we've got to become more involved again."

Bin Laden's presumed role in the European plot was first reported by NPR.

One senior U.S. official, meanwhile, discounted any involvement in the Europe terror plot by al-Qaida's North African affiliate. While al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb is dangerous in its region and may want to export its terror operations to Europe, there are no indications that it is able to do that at this time, said the official.

A Pakistani intelligence official said Thursday that eight Germans and two British brothers are at the heart of the European terror plot, which is still in its early stages. One of the Britons was killed in a recent CIA missile strike, he said.

Pakistan, Britain and Germany are tracking the suspects and intercepting their phone calls, the official told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information to the media.

U.S. officials have pressed Pakistan to increase its efforts to root out the militants hiding in the mountainous border region.

The U.S. has dramatically stepped up its missile attacks in North Waziristan, and is believed to have launched at least 21 this month. The covert campaign is largely carried out by CIA drones and has led to the deaths of a number of top militant leaders.

Pakistan has complained vocally about the program but is believed to provide intelligence assistance for at least some of the strikes.

TEHRAN (AP) - Syrian President Bashar Assad offered dim hopes Saturday for any success in Middle East peace talks, saying the White House is only using its mediation between Israelis and Palestinians to score political points in the United States. The comments by Assad during a one-day visit to Tehran followed talks with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Both leaders pledged to support "resistance" in the region, an apparent reference to Palestinian militants and others opposing Israel.

Palestinians Say Talks With Israel Should Be Suspended

By ETHAN BRONNER

New York Times

RAMALLAH, West Bank — The Palestinian leadership said Saturday that four-week-old direct talks with Israel should be suspended as long as Jewish settlement housing was being built in the West Bank. It called on the international community to pressure Israel to stop the construction.

A statement issued after a meeting of about 35 Palestinian leaders — the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the central committee of the main Fatah movement and a handful of others — held at the compound of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said that Israel was responsible for the deadlock.

"The leadership confirms that the resumption of talks requires tangible steps, the first of them a freeze on settlements," Yasser Abed Rabbo, a senior P.L.O. official said after the three-hour meeting. "The Palestinian leadership holds Israel responsible for obstructing the negotiations."

The Obama administration envoy to the region, George J. Mitchell, met repeatedly in recent days with Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel in hopes of keeping the new talks alive. But he left on Friday, having made no progress.

Mr. Mitchell remains in the region, talking with Arab leaders before an Arab League meeting planned for next Friday in Libya, where the issue of direct talks with Israel will be debated and where, Mr. Abbas has said, a final decision on the future of the talks will be made.

Barring a last-minute deal, the talks seemed to be in deep trouble.

Mr. Abbas was due to see King Hussein of Jordan on Sunday and then Hosni Mubarak, the president of Egypt, as efforts continue to find a solution.

Israel halted most settlement construction for 10 months last November, saying it viewed the politically difficult step as a gesture to lure the Palestinians into direct peace talks. Mr. Abbas consented to the talks nine months later but threatened to abandon them if the freeze was lifted.

Mr. Netanyahu argues that the future of the settlements should be part of a mix of issues to be discussed in the coming year of talks, not a precondition for talks. The Palestinians say the Israelis agreed to end settlement expansion in a 2003 road map for peace and have failed to live up to that commitment. They add that settlements violate international law and are eating up the land on which they plan to build their state.

Mr. Netanyahu told his close aides on Friday that he would not freeze settlements further but would limit the building, according to an official briefed on that meeting.

"Everyone knows that restrained and moderate building in Judea and Samaria in the coming year will not affect the peace map at all," he said, according to the official, using the biblical term for the West Bank. "Therefore the international community must call on the Palestinians to stay in the peace talks. It is in the interest of the Palestinians, just as it is in ours."

Since Mr. Abed Rabbo on Saturday also asked for assistance from the international community, it now appears that both sides, instead of talking to each other, have returned to making their cases to the world, hoping other governments will intercede on their behalf.

The Obama administration has offered Israel security guarantees and military hardware in exchange for a one-time 60-day extension of the building freeze. But so far Mr. Netanyahu has turned that down, saying that sticking to his word on a one-time freeze was more important than the elements of the American offer.

The Palestinians say they, too, have concerns about credibility if they return to talks while settlement building resumes.

Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a close aide to Mr. Abbas, said Saturday that Mr. Abbas had staked his credibility on ending negotiations if settlements began again. Asked how to assess the diplomacy of recent days, Mr. Abu Rudeineh said, "So far efforts have reached a dead end."

POLITICO

Inside W.H., calls for shake-up

By: Glenn Thrush
November 3, 2010 10:30 AM EDT

Some of the calls for a White House shake-up are now coming from inside the building.

Frustrated current and former West Wing staffers, speaking on condition of anonymity, told POLITICO they hoped Tuesday night's humbling losses would persuade President Barack Obama to pursue a much more sweeping fix than just the "natural" post-election churn of personnel his administration has insisted will take place.

Many of those changes are already being seriously considered, among them: replacing Political Director Patrick Gaspard with a former top aide to Rahm Emanuel; replacing deputy chief of staff Jim Messina, who is expected to move to Obama's 2012 campaign, with Legislative Affairs Director Phil Schiliro; and possibly giving White House energy czar Carol Browner expanded policy responsibilities.

But if Obama's critics are focusing on his agenda and messaging, many on his team are urging him to address what they see as a major organizational flaw: an amorphous, ill-defined chain of command in the West Wing that concentrates too much power in too few hands, hampering efficiency, accountability and communication.

"If there's still only five, 10 people making decisions, then we haven't learned our lesson from Tuesday," said one aide, who believes the problem starts with Obama's insistence on giving his senior advisers, Valerie Jarrett and David Axelrod, broadly sketched responsibilities.

But the issue isn't confined to the upper levels. Several Obama insiders pointed to a surplus of West Wingers who spin out ideas by the bushel — and a shortage of seasoned middle managers to execute and sell them.

"They've been here for two years; they need a more grown-up system," one former administration official said. "They've gone too horizontal."

Key Obama aides — including interim chief of staff Pete Rouse, who has been tasked with creating a new organizational plan, and press secretary Robert Gibbs, who is seeking to carve out a role beyond briefing reporters — have reportedly made that point directly to the president.

But it's not clear whether Obama, who ordered Rouse to conduct an institutional review of the West Wing, is ready to scrap a loose, comfortable system that allowed him to respond quickly to multiple crises for a more conventional executive organization.

No one expects Obama to immediately heed calls to conduct a major housecleaning — or inject fresh blood into the West Wing by bringing in outsiders or even a Republican or two, as former Sen. Tom Daschle, an Obama ally, has counseled.

White House officials maintain they will make gradual changes — and hope that the arrival of Obama's organization-building 2008 campaign manager, David Plouffe, sometime in early 2011 will provide the West Wing with more focus.

But Ken Duberstein, former chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan, said the White House needs to move much more quickly. "There's a window of six to nine months where serious governing can take place before people start looking at the [2012] primaries," he said.

Mike McCurry, President Bill Clinton's former press secretary, said Tuesday's results will usher in changes to Obama's day-to-day operations, whether he likes them or not.

"President Clinton had to submit to a lot more discipline and structure in his daily schedule," said McCurry, who was an aide to then-Secretary of State Warren Christopher during the Democrats' devastating two-house loss in the 1994 midterms.

We had "little calendars that had color codes on how [Clinton] was spending his time. ... Enjoying the solitude of the office is probably over [for Obama]," he added.

Obama has had weeks to brace for the worst, unlike Clinton, who was blindsided by the '94 results. But some of Obama's allies fear he will take Tuesday's results too much in stride. That perception was fueled by Axelrod, who told a gathering of Democrats earlier this week that he didn't interpret Tuesday's expected debacle as a rejection of the president.

"I'm not sure [Obama] gets it yet," said one person close to the president.

But Rouse apparently does. In recent weeks, he has solicited advice and detailed memos from key administration players and allies outside the White House, especially former White House Communications Director Anita Dunn.

The results, gleaned from insiders, are a range of plans to restructure Obama's policy, political, legislative affairs and communications operations.

No final decisions have been made. But Rouse — a quiet, meticulous organizer who inherited a chaotic system designed on the fly by Emanuel after Emanuel left the White House to run for mayor of Chicago — is determined to clarify lines of authority and wants to assign more specific job descriptions to senior staff.

There are no plans to embark on a wholesale purge: The structural changes, if Obama signs off on them, are intended to dovetail with the anticipated departure of some personnel and reshuffling of a relatively small cast of Obama insiders.

"It's a combination of two things: natural attrition and changes that want to be made," another aide said. But "some people have done all they can here."

And many of the biggest West Wing moves were preloaded before Nov. 2, in part to avoid the appearance of a mass exodus — including the departures of Emanuel, Office of Management and Budget Chief Peter Orszag (himself a critic of the White House management structure), Council of Economic Advisers Chairwoman Christina Romer and National Economic Council Chairman Larry Summers.

Among the first post-election moves, according to people familiar with the planning, will be to move Gaspard, who has fallen out of favor, to another administration job or a position outside the White House.

The top candidate to replace him is said to be veteran House Democratic staffer Sean Sweeney, who served as Emanuel's chief of staff.

Messina, an Obama favorite who is said to be headed to Chicago next year with Axelrod to work on Obama's reelection effort, is likely to be replaced by Schiliro, though Schiliro won't inherit Messina's wide-ranging political portfolio.

The legislative affairs office — a pre-midterm powerhouse that pushed through the stimulus, regulatory reform and health care bills — will most likely be downsized to reflect Obama's curtailed agenda on the Hill.

But Schiliro, a former aide to Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), will pick up a crucial new assignment: In conjunction with White House counsel Bob Bauer, he's expected to defend Obama against an anticipated wave of GOP hearings and investigations spearheaded by the feared new chairman of the House Oversight Committee, California Rep. Darrell Issa.

Less clear is what Rouse and Obama have in store for the policy team — a group that becomes much more important now that any meaningful legislative action is shut down by House Republicans and a shrunken Senate majority.

In a flashback to the Clinton years, the administration will now be forced to rely on creative rule writing and new regulatory strategies to counter Republican obstruction on the Hill.

Several people familiar with the situation said that Browner, one of the few Clinton administration veterans to earn the president's trust — is being considered for a newly envisioned policy job.

Browner, known for her aggressive rule making when she was Environmental Protection Agency administrator, would supplant deputy chief of staff Mona Sutphen, who is expected to leave the administration sometime in 2011.

Melody Barnes, director of Obama's Domestic Policy Council, is also expected to take on a greater role.

In the meantime, Rouse has quietly sought to change the culture inside the West Wing by enfranchising a wider circle of advisers than did Emanuel, who was prone to making spur-of-the-moment decisions consulting only a handful of trusted aides.

The changes are small but significant. Emanuel made many of his decisions at his signature 7:30 a.m. meeting in the chief of staff's office — and often used a larger 8:30 a.m. sit-down simply to issue marching orders.

Rouse, by contrast, seems to put more weight on the later meeting because it gives more junior staff an opportunity to take part in decision making, insiders say.

Lauren/Cheryl,
And--Please let Hillary know that I have invited Australian Foreign Minister Kevin Rudd to speak at Occidental in the coming year--on China or whatever topic he pleases. His chief of staff Philip Green has responded with some interest, and the Australian CG in LA is very excited to make it happen. Consulate here has invited me to speak at conference in January in LA on the US and Australia in Asia, and I have accepted (a good topic too if embassy Canberra wanted to invite me down as PD speaker). It would be helpful, if Hillary can work it in to her informal time with Rudd to mention me and Oxy in a favorable way and encourage him to accept the invitation to speak on our campus. I'd certainly appreciate it.
Thanks as ever,
Derek
I just saw the news reports on the program that Hillary will be doing with young Australians in Melbourne o Sunday. Looks great. And perhaps she will get to meet my friend Glyn Davis, head of University of Melbourne on margins of event.

This is not good news, but it is very helpful. Understandably there is an enormous amount of emotion around this. My view, which may not be heeded by the family and their supporters, is that a little patience would be helpful here to see what might happen back channel. Again, I really appreciate the time you are putting into this. In the big picture this is small potatoes, but of course to the family, it is everything. Howard

We do not know when that judicial process will be completed, although the next hearing is scheduled for October. The Embassy is currently trying to ensure that Mr. Bower, who is en route to Egypt now, will be able to see his sons as called for in a current Egyptian court order.

I thought you would be interested in this information which comes from a US Govt source outside the State Dept. Don't know if the Secretary was aware of the back channel discussions at the time she raised the case. Mubarak apparently feels no one has responded to his wish list which may have something to do with turning over the kids into a visitation

If you feel comfortable - there is one more piece of info we believe cheryl mills needs to have - and that is - the fact that mubarek is trying to do some horse trading regarding the return of the bower boys. Mubarek wants - health care in usa for himself, some chit w clintons in future, consideration on human rights bill, and consideration for his successor. I am not saying that USG has to give in on these. But I am saying that USG has to be aware that mubarek wants to solve our issue - but wants his requests to at least be acknowledged.

Background

Quote from a readout of Netanyahu's meeting with senior advisers on Friday:

"Everyone knows that restrained and moderate construction in Judea and Samaria in the next year will no even affect the peace process. Therefore the international community needs to call on the Palestinians to continue engaging in peace talks. It is in the interest of the Palestinians just as it is in ours"... "We did it [the moratorium] in order to give the opportunity to enter direct negotiations without preconditions. Now I expect that the Palestinians show their flexibility and continue with peace talks."..."Unfortunately, as opposed to us, the Palestinians are just hardening their stance."

Quote from Yasser Abed Rabbo that Bibi may raise:
"The leadership confirms that the resumption of talks requires tangible steps, the first of them a freeze on settlements. The Palestinian leadership holds Israel responsible for obstructing the negotiations."

Subject: (AP) Peace talks come and go, but a settlement grows

REVAVA (AP) - The American president was pushing hard for a Mideast peace agreement when six Jewish families arrived on this West Bank hilltop early one morning with cribs, refrigerators, Israeli flags and flatbed trucks carrying mobile homes.

White House condemnation came quickly: "Settlements are an obstacle to peace and their continuation does not contribute to the development of a peace process which we have all been working toward."

It was April 16, 1991.

Since then peace talks have started, stopped, restarted, and now it's President Barack Obama's turn to feel frustrated. Last week Israel ended its temporary settlement freeze, Palestinians threatened to quit the talks Obama has brokered, and settlers were celebrating in Revava, where those first trailers have been replaced by red-roofed suburban homes and six families have become 250.

The story is the same across the West Bank, where settlements have evolved from tenuous Jewish footholds into a massive presence across the hilly country which Israel captured in the 1967 war and which Palestinians want for their own state.

They have grown steadily through years of international condemnation, diplomacy, periods of violence and negotiations. They have often expanded as a direct protest against negotiations and the possibility that an Israeli government might uproot them.

In 1991, when the first Bush administration was coaxing Israelis and Palestinians to the negotiating table, 90,300 Israelis lived in settlements across the West Bank. Today there are 300,000, and their population is growing by 5 percent a year, more than 2 1/2 times the growth rate inside Israel.

The settlements themselves, ranging from small cities to isolated enclaves, take up just one percent of the area of the West Bank, according to government maps analyzed by Israeli human rights campaigners. But their impact is much greater than that number would suggest; the settlements and their access roads form a web of Israeli control that Palestinians say rules out any chance of viable statehood.

Nowhere is the expansion, and its interplay with the politics of peacemaking, more apparent than at Revava.

When those first families arrived on this rocky hill next to the Palestinian village of Kifl Hares, President George H. W. Bush's secretary of state, James Baker, was en route to Israel on a round of shuttle diplomacy.

One settler leader, Daniella Weiss, told The Associated Press at the time that they had "hurried the decision" on Revava to undermine Baker's plans.

Government permits had been issued and the land, settlers said, had been quietly purchased from local Palestinians.

The Israeli government was led, as it is now, by the Likud Party, historically a champion of West Bank settlement, claiming the territory as part of the biblical Land of Israel promised by God and as indispensable to Israel's security.

Some ministers in the government of then-prime minister Yitzhak Shamir reacted sourly to Revava's establishment; the government was trying to mollify the U.S. and appear receptive to peace while simultaneously settling Jews in the West Bank according to its own master plan. But the balancing act was becoming increasingly precarious.

Israeli doves were furious about Revava. Lawmaker Yossi Sarid likened it to "planting a bomb aboard (Baker's) plane in order to blow up his mission."

The settlers were young couples raised in observant Jewish homes. Gideon and Miri Goldis arrived with boxes of possessions and three children under age 3. Nineteen years later, the family lives in a neat stucco home and have nine children.

"I had the good fortune to come to a rocky, empty hilltop and start a Zionist settlement enterprise that my grandfather could only dream of. Suddenly there was another ZIP code in the post office and another place on the map," Gideon Goldis said last week.

"I don't know what Baker wanted, or what Obama wants now, or any other leader - these are secondary," he said. "What comes first is my people, their birthright and their security."

Since the Goldises arrived, six Israeli prime ministers have held peace talks with the Palestinians. Some have officially restricted settlement construction. Through all of this, Revava has kept growing.

Settlements sometimes went up with the intention of forestalling concessions and in response to international pressure, said Israeli writer Gershom Gorenberg, who has documented the history of the settlement movement.

"The red-tiled houses on the hilltops remain as monuments to the fallen peace initiatives of the past," he said in an interview.

Unlike the Likud leaders of two decades ago, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu says he accepts Palestinian statehood in at least part of the West Bank. But the Palestinian leadership sees settlement construction as the true litmus test of Israeli intentions, and insists the freeze must be maintained.

The settlers see themselves as the aggrieved party, at odds with the Palestinians, the White House, and often their own government. At Revava's celebrations last week, a sign with Obama's picture referenced the controversy over the planned Islamic center near Ground Zero in Manhattan, saying: "If Islam can build anywhere, why can't I?"

Gideon Goldis' father, Avraham, was a metallurgical engineer in Philadelphia before he immigrated to Israel. In 2000 he followed his son to Revava.

Beyond ideology, he said, he found a close-knit community 10 minutes' drive from central Israel. A house in Revava costs about $270,000, he said, a fraction of the price in Israel's center.

"The Americans said, 'you're torpedoing our efforts,'" said Goldis, 73. "We say, 'we're coming to live in Israel, why can't we live wherever we want?'"

Two decades after Baker's trip, with a new push under way for a peace agreement that would require Israel to cede most or all of the West Bank, is Goldis concerned about Revava's future?

"I'm not worried at all," he said.

ISLAMABAD (Reuters) - Pakistan will only re-open a supply route for coalition troops in Afghanistan once public anger over NATO incursions eases and security improves, the foreign ministry spokesman said October 3.

Militants threatened more attacks on tankers carrying fuel to Afghanistan through routes in Pakistan to avenge the incursions.

"Unless the reaction cools down and we make sure that the supply line is secured, we cannot reopen it," Foreign Ministry spokesman Abdul Basit told Reuters.

Angered by repeated incursions by NATO helicopters over the past week, Pakistan blocked a supply route for NATO troops in Afghanistan after one such strike killed three Pakistani soldiers on September 30 in the northwestern Kurram region.

I have not been able to get a psychology dinner set up, but I have found the article that you read on the difference an apology can make in the Middle East (coming in next email) and commissioned a useful paper from Louise Diamond, an expert on psychology and negotiations who has done a lot of work between the Israels and the Palestinians herself (attached). It's about 5 pages; I really think it is worth a read. Finally, on changing the frame to look forward, I strongly recommend that you spend 8 minutes to look at a video produced by a Rand study called The Arc, which proposes a high-speed road/rail project connecting the key cities in the West Bank and Gaza. It is a powerful, powerful vision of what could be, one that will play right into Bibi's emphasis on economic growth. For my money, it would be worth a private 8 minutes screening. I will send the link in the next email.

Subject: If bilateral talks fail, a regional approach

For your Sunday reading, a summary of an interesting proposal by former Jordanian foreign minister Marwan Muasher.

"Palestinian-Israeli Direct Talks: The Case for a Regional Approach"By Marwan Muasher (Carnegie Endowment Bulletin, August 2010)

Marwan Muasher – former Jordanian foreign minister, ambassador, and deputy prime minister – advocates a regional settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, capitalizing on the 2002 Arab Peace Initiative. His approach depends first on securing end-game "deposits" from all parties: The parties would offer hypothetical commitments that they might not be willing to give at the onset, but that can be "deposited" with the U.S. and committed to only if the other side is willing to do the same. Saudi Arabia's deposit, for instance, would outline and agree to a package that included details about Jerusalem. The Saudi package would also promise to secure Arab and Muslim backing for the painful compromises the Palestinians would need to accept.

Muasher advocates a similar approach to the Syrian track—asking Syria to deposit end-game commitments in return for full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. In their deposits, the Saudis and the Syrians must clearly commit to address the inclusion of Hamas and Hezbollah in any regional agreement. The Arab states would not only have to end all logistical, financial, and military support for these two groups, but they would have to assume responsibility for delivering these two actors, helping to transform them into political players. Israel's deposit would spell out its commitment to a solution based on 1967 borders and a return of the Golan.

According to Muasher, these deposits would make it much easier for President Abbas to engage in talks aimed at ending the conflict. After he has been given Arab cover, Abbas could provide his own end-game deposits. According to Muasher, absent these commitments from the Arab states, the Palestinian positions will remain maximalist. Once the U.S. has deposits from all sides that make for a reasonable, comprehensive package, it should put this package on the table in cooperation with the Quartet. Once the comprehensive package is presented, the U.S. can focus on confidence-building measures to move all sides toward the end game.

More on Patterns in Intractable Conflicts

By Louise Diamond, Ph.D.

In deep-rooted, intractable conflicts, the parties often develop unconscious patterns of behavior that impede the peace process.

We know that all behavior is purposeful. We also know that human beings are not necessarily rational actors; they do not always act in their own best interest. Sometimes the unconscious purpose of these patterns, therefore, is counter-intuitive: to maintain the status quo, even if it is painful, because we're scared of the unknown, or of giving up something we think we now have. Or the purpose might be to make things worse for the other side, even if it hurts us more; or to seek our own gain, even when we can see that by doing so we actually hurt ourselves further. We can identify the purpose or goals behind these patterns by seeing their results.

Because they are unconscious, and deeply entrenched over time, the patterns are especially hard to change. They are also mutual – that is, there is some collusion or mutuality between the parties that keeps the pattern going (again, unconsciously). There will be resistance to changing the behavior; the patterns have developed because the parties somehow believed they served their interests.

The mediators can help change the patterns in five general ways, all intended as non-confrontational and non-judgmental, and as ways to invite awareness and to present a possible pathway to different behavior:

1. Educate the parties briefly about the pattern – describe how it works. "What's happening now is a repetitive pattern; this is how it works.... Do you recognize this?"
2. Name the pattern when you see it happening. "Oh, this is the X pattern again. Does it feel familiar? How can we do something different?"
3. Acknowledge the universality of the pattern. "This is not unique to you; it is common in most conflicts. Even in most families!"
4. Interrupt the behavior – turn to something else (general rule of thumb: shift between content, process, and psychology when any one piece is not going well). "We seem to be stuck in the X pattern again. Let's move on to Y and see if we can get some fresh thinking."
5. Enlarge the frame; re-focus attention on the main priority: a successful peace process. "This is that X pattern again, and it's not useful in moving the process forward."

Specific suggestions will also be given for each pattern.

The Blame Game. This pattern can be tricky. There's a difference between stating a fact and playing the Blame Game. The PLO really did launch terrorist attacks against Israel. Israel really does take Palestinian land for settlements. To state the facts is not to play the Blame Game. It becomes a game when it has other motives:

- To avoid taking responsibility for one's own contribution to the conflict;
- To avoid responsibility for finding a solution because one prefers the status quo;
- To look good in the eyes of the third party or international community, while making the other side look bad; to identify the other side as the primary roadblock to progress.

Some behaviors that characterize this game:

- One party sets impossible conditions or ultimatums that they know won't be accepted by the other side, and then blames the other side for not being a true partner for peace, or not being sincere about wanting a solution. ('Aha! See, we told you it was their fault!')
- One party excuses its bad behavior by saying, essentially, 'if the other side hadn't done that, we wouldn't have had to do what we did.' ('They made us do it!')
- The parties trade blame, like children. ('It' your fault! No, it's your fault;' 'You started it! Did not! Did so!')

What might the mediators say?

- When the parties get into blaming ("See, they did x,y, and z...!"), say, "No one action stands by itself; we're always reacting to each other. So what did your side do that might have contributed to this?"
- Or, "Yes, that really happened. Now we're looking at what we can do differently, or how we can make some agreements so that that doesn't happen again."

The Drama Triangle. This pattern is very familiar to us because it is central to much of our literature and drama (especially melodrama). There are three archetypal roles – victim, persecutor, and rescuer (the Villain, who seeks to harm the Innocent, and the Hero, who tries to save the day). In deep-rooted conflicts, what often happens is that the parties in conflict plus the third party will shift who's playing what role at any one time.

The goal of the pattern:

- To avoid making progress toward peace.
- To stay in familiar territory and not have to take risks with new behavior.

Some behaviors that characterize the game:

- One party will play the role of victim, another of persecutor, and the other (often the third party) of rescuer, there to help 'fix' or solve the situation.
- Then, something will happen and the roles will change. The one who was the victim will become the persecutor (or rescuer); the previous persecutor will now be the rescuer (or victim); and the previous rescuer will become the new victim (persecutor).

- The parties will cycle through these different roles at different times, never really making any progress.
- Examples: When Israel announced new settlement development during Vice President Biden's visit, the rescuer (the U.S.) became the victim, and the victim (Israel) became the persecutor. When Israel boarded the Rachel Corrie headed for Gaza, they were seeing themselves as victims and the blockade breakers as the persecutors, but when several of the ship's people were killed, the Israeli's were seen as the persecutors. The Palestinians see the Israelis as persecutors in the settlement issue, while they are the victims, but when the US spoke strongly for a settlement freeze, it became the persecutor and Israel became the victim.
- It is common for the parties to unconsciously collude so that the third party, the rescuer, gets blamed for lack of progress or even for making things worse, thus joining together as persecutors against a new victim.

What can the mediators do?

- Notice when you're playing an unhealthy 'rescuer' role: for instance, when you feel compelled to find the fix to a tough issue rather than helping the parties to do it, or when you want the solution more than the parties do. Choose to put the responsibility back on the parties.
- When noticing the cycle in action, say, for instance, 'Oh, we seem to be caught in that drama triangle again. There are no villains, victims, or rescuers here – we've all contributed to the problems in different ways and we're all working toward the same goal, a successful peace process.'

The Demonization and De-humanization of 'the Other.' In this pattern one side portrays the other side as less than human; as barbarians, uncultured, not intelligent, etc; not like 'us;' incapable of feeling, thinking, or acting as 'we' do (i.e., as 'normal' human beings). The other side is demonized, seen as the embodiment of all evil and at fault for the conflict. 'We' are the all good and 'they' are the all bad.

This pattern may not appear so obviously in the peace talks, as the negotiators are probably individuals who have had more extensive experience with their counterparts than most average citizens. However, this pattern is more likely than others to be consciously manipulated by political leaders, to be firmly ensconced in the educational system, and to be a staple of the media.

The purpose of this pattern.

- It shields the parties from hearing each other's legitimate needs and interests, and especially their pain. If 'they' are not as fully human as 'we' are, then what 'they' want doesn't count, or what 'they' feel can be dismissed as inconsequential. If we don't have to acknowledge 'their' pain, we don't have to feel responsible for it, feel empathy for them, or do anything about it.

- It allows each side to justify its own violent acts against the other. If 'they' don't value life like 'we' do, then 'they' don't mind as much when we take their life.
- It socializes society into sustaining the story of 'us' against 'them' and the enemy image.

What the mediators can do.
- Be alert for it – it can be very subtle.
- Call it whenever you see it, as you would a racial slur. "That's a demeaning of a whole people." "We're here to acknowledge our common humanity and shared hopes for a better future." "We all have the same capacity for... intelligence, pain, caring about our families (whenever it happens to be).
- Provide opportunities for re-humanizing through personal contact (eating, seating, free time, sub-group dialogue opportunities).

The Suffering Yardstick. This is the most difficult pattern to interrupt, because the parties tend to be very attached to their suffering. It has become, over time, a major part of their identity. The trick is to acknowledge the suffering, but disallow the measuring of one party's suffering over the other. All human beings suffer in the face of violence, displacement, humiliation, etc. Each human being's suffering is awful to them.

In the Israeli-Palestinian situation this is huge. The Holocaust is seen, and in many ways legitimately so, as of a much greater magnitude and significance than the Nakba. Yet the historical and daily suffering of the Palestinians must be acknowledged as legitimate and important too. The trauma on both sides is a major element that undermines the possibility of a negotiated settlement of concrete issues. These are not rational actors seeking a rational solution – they are deeply wounded parties living in collective pain that they blame on each other.

Behaviors that characterize the pattern.
- One side argues that their suffering is bigger, stronger, and more worthy of sympathy than that of the other side. (In this case, usually Israel)
- One side gets angry that the suffering of the other should be compared to theirs, seen as equal or parallel. (In this case, usually Israel)
- One side diminishes or demeans or disallows the expression of suffering by the other.

What can the mediators say?
- "Everyone is suffering, and has been for a long time in this situation. This is our opportunity to put a stop to it, and, when we're ready, to start the healing process."

- "It may seem like the pain is disproportionate in numbers, but let's remember that for each person who's lost a family member or a home or a hope, the pain is the same."
- "It is true that there are unrightable wrongs on both sides here. It's important to acknowledge that and grieve. We cannot go back and re-write history, but we can feel each other's pain in the present, and create a different future for our children." Or '..... feel each other's pain in the present, and decide together to break the cycle here and now."

In sum, there are potent psycho/social/political patterns at play in the unconscious dynamics of intractable conflicts, which can present major roadblocks to a successful peace negotiation. Awareness is the first step to change. The more the mediators are aware of these patterns, and can help the parties notice them as well, the better equipped everyone is, together, to break out of well-traveled ruts and discover new possibilities.

Subject: If bilateral talks fail, a regional approach

For your Sunday reading, a summary of an interesting proposal by former Jordanian foreign minister Marwan Muasher.

"Palestinian-Israeli Direct Talks: The Case for a Regional Approach"By Marwan Muasher (Carnegie Endowment Bulletin, August 2010)

Marwan Muasher – former Jordanian foreign minister, ambassador, and deputy prime minister – advocates a regional settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, capitalizing on the 2002 Arab Peace Initiative. His approach depends first on securing end-game "deposits" from all parties: The parties would offer hypothetical commitments that they might not be willing to give at the onset, but that can be "deposited" with the U.S. and committed to only if the other side is willing to do the same. Saudi Arabia's deposit, for instance, would outline and agree to a package that included details about Jerusalem. The Saudi package would also promise to secure Arab and Muslim backing for the painful compromises the Palestinians would need to accept.

Muasher advocates a similar approach to the Syrian track—asking Syria to deposit end-game commitments in return for full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. In their deposits, the Saudis and the Syrians must clearly commit to address the inclusion of Hamas and Hezbollah in any regional agreement. The Arab states would not only have to end all logistical, financial, and military support for these two groups, but they would have to assume responsibility for delivering these two actors, helping to transform them into political players. Israel's deposit would spell out its commitment to a solution based on 1967 borders and a return of the Golan.

According to Muasher, these deposits would make it much easier for President Abbas to engage in talks aimed at ending the conflict. After he has been given Arab cover, Abbas could provide his own end-game deposits. According to Muasher, absent these commitments from the Arab states, the Palestinian positions will remain maximalist. Once the U.S. has deposits from all sides that make for a reasonable, comprehensive package, it should put this package on the table in cooperation with the Quartet. Once the comprehensive package is presented, the U.S. can focus on confidence-building measures to move all sides toward the end game.

CYRUS NOW PLAYING

As diplomats stitch together a cease-fire between Hamas and Israel, the most depressing feature of the conflict is the sense that future fighting is inevitable. Rational calculation suggests that neither side can win these wars. The thousands of lives and billions of dollars sacrificed in fighting demonstrate the advantages of peace and coexistence, yet still both sides opt to fight.

This small territory is the world's great symbolic knot. "Palestine is the mother of all problems" is a common refrain among people we have interviewed across the Muslim world: from Middle Eastern leaders to fighters in the remote island jungles of Indonesia; from Islamist senators in Pakistan to volunteers for martyrdom on the move from Morocco to Iraq.

Some analysts see this as a testament to the essentially religious nature of the conflict. But research we recently undertook suggests a way to go beyond that. For there is a moral logic to seemingly intractable religious and cultural disputes. These conflicts cannot be reduced to secular calculations of interest but must be dealt with on their own terms, a logic very different from the marketplace or realpolitik.

Across the world, people believe that devotion to sacred or core values that incorporate moral beliefs - like the welfare of family and country, or commitment to religion and honor - are, or ought to be, absolute and inviolable. Our studies, carried out with the support of the National Science Foundation and the Defense Department, suggest that people will reject material compensation for dropping their commitment to sacred values and will defend those values regardless of the costs.

In our research, we surveyed nearly 4,000 Palestinians and Israelis from 2004 to 2008, questioning citizens across the political spectrum including refugees, supporters of Hamas and Israeli settlers in the West Bank. We asked them to react to hypothetical but realistic compromises in which their side would be required to give away something it valued in return for a lasting peace.

All those surveyed responded to the same set of deals. First they would be given a straight-up offer in which each side would make difficult concessions in exchange for peace, next they were given a scenario in which their side was granted an additional material incentive, and last came a proposal in which the other side agreed to a symbolic sacrifice of one of its sacred values.

For example, a typical set of trade-offs offered to a Palestinian might begin with this premise: Suppose the UN organized a peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians under which

Palestinians would be required to give up their right to return to their homes in Israel and there would be two states, a Jewish state of Israel and a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza. Second, we would sweeten the pot: In return, Western nations would give the Palestinian state $10 billion a year for 100 years. Then the symbolic concession: For its part, Israel would officially apologize for the displacement of civilians in the 1948 war.

Almost everyone we surveyed rejected the initial solutions we offered - ideas that are accepted as common sense among most Westerners, like simply trading land for peace or accepting shared sovereignty over Jerusalem. Why the opposition?

Many of the respondents insisted that the values involved were sacred to them. For example, nearly half the Israeli settlers we surveyed said they would not consider trading any land in the West Bank - territory they believe was granted them by God - in exchange for peace. More than half the Palestinians considered full sovereignty over Jerusalem in the same light, and more than four-fifths felt that the "right of return" was a sacred value, too.

In general the greater the monetary incentive involved in the deal, the greater the disgust from respondents. This strongly implies that using the standard approaches of "businesslike negotiations" favored by Western diplomats will only backfire.

Many Westerners seem to ignore these clearly expressed "irrational" preferences, because in a sensible world they ought not to exist. Diplomats hope that peace and progress on material and quality-of-life matters will eventually make people forget the more heartfelt issues. But this is only a recipe for another Hundred Years' War - progress on everyday material matters will simply heighten attention on value-laden issues of "who we are and want to be."

Fortunately, our work also offers hints of another, more optimistic course.

Absolutists who violently rejected offers of money or peace for sacred land were considerably more inclined to accept deals that involved their enemies making symbolic but difficult gestures. For example, Palestinian hard-liners were more willing to consider recognizing the right of Israel to exist if the Israelis simply offered an official apology for Palestinian suffering in the 1948 war.

Similarly, Israeli respondents said they could live with a partition of Jerusalem and borders very close to those that existed before the 1967 war if Hamas and the other major Palestinian groups explicitly recognized Israel's right to exist.

Remarkably, our survey results were mirrored by our discussions with political leaders from both sides. For example, Mousa Abu Marzook (the deputy chairman of Hamas) said no when we proposed a trade-off for peace without granting a right of return. He became angry when we added in the idea of substantial American aid for rebuilding: "No, we do not sell ourselves for any amount."

But when we mentioned a potential Israeli apology for 1948, he brightened: "Yes, an apology is important, as a beginning. It's not enough, because our houses and land were taken away from us, and something has to be done about that." This suggested that progress on values might open the way for negotiations on material issues.

We got a similar reaction from Benjamin Netanyahu, the hard-line former Israeli prime minister. We asked him whether he would seriously consider accepting a two-state solution following the 1967 borders if all major Palestinian factions, including Hamas, were to recognize the right of the Jewish people to an independent state. He answered, "O.K., but the Palestinians would have to show that they sincerely mean it, change their textbooks and anti-Semitic characterizations."

Making these sorts of wholly intangible "symbolic" concessions, like an apology or recognition of a right to exist, simply doesn't compute on any utilitarian calculus. And yet the science says they may be the best way to start cutting the knot.

Here is the link to the video of The Arc. http://friendsofthearc.org/, a national infrastructure trunkline for a future Palestinian State developed by the RAND Corporation. It is only 8 minutes long, but a great overview of the Arc vision and its potential for enabling peace in the region. I promise you it is worth it. It has tested very well with both Palestinians, Israelis and American Jews and Palestinians. It is a genuinely a transformational idea that did not originate from American politicians or diplomats, but rather from innovative American minds in collaboration with stakeholders from all walks of life in Palestine, Israel, the US, Europe, and the Muslim world. And it could be largely financed with private finance.

Ms. Slaughter,

Again, great talk today at the CNAS annual event. Thanks for your time.

As you will remember, I raised the point that we seem not to be engaging regimes or populations regarding affirmative visions of what their societies could achieve in (say) a decade, if only we invested in a certain development strategy.

Clearly, you had once heard about the RAND Corporation's Arc Concept (perhaps from Steve Simon?), for a national infrastructure trunkline for a future Palestinian State. To regain familiarity, please watch the 8 minute video on the home page of www.friendsofthearc.org which provides a great overview of the Arc vision, and its potential for enabling peace in the region. This is an affirmative vision that sells very well to both Palestinians, Israelis and American Jews and Palestinians. I would be happy to prove this. Just imagine if the US came out in support of this vision.

If President Obama simply said something like "The Arc is a great example of a transformational idea which did not originate from American politicians or diplomats, but rather from innovative American minds in collaboration with stakeholders from all walks of life in Palestine, Israel, the US, Europe, and the Muslim world. It's the kind of initiative that I am happy to endorse, and I look forward to better understanding how, through the Arc, America can make a positive contributions to peace, prosperity and security in the region." - some very interesting things would happen. For example, the PIF and other forms of private finance might just finance the whole thing...not requiring any (or at least much) US $.

You don't know me from Adam, but lets just say that I can say with confidence that PM Fayyad backs the Arc as a key part of his two year plan for statehood, and that Abu Mazen's economic advisor (Dr. Mohammad Mustafa - CEO of the PIF) does also. And, that President Peres has been a long time supporter (I have the letter on my computer). I happen to know that Zbigniew Brzezinski will soon be taking a package to NSA Jones on the topic.
Zbig is a huge fan, as are many others from the establishment. If we met for 15 minutes, I could explain the nature of the collective action problem that has prevented many Arc fans from speaking up, and I could explain how I am fixing this problem.

This is a concrete engagement strategy that would not cost the President political capital, but would actually manufacture political capital.

If you are willing to talk for 15-20 minutes, I would be happy to run up to Foggy Bottom to brief you up on the Arc, and where I plan to take it over the next 2 quarters.

Thanks in advance for your interest, and I look forward to getting together.

NEW YORK (AP) - Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says "the future belongs to Iran," and challenged the United States to accept that his country has a major role in the world. The comment came in an hour-long interview with The Associated Press on the first day of his visit to the United States to attend the annual General Assembly at the United Nations. He restated that his government does not want an atomic bomb and is only seeking peace and a nuclear-free world. He gave no indication when Iran would resume talks on its nuclear program and said any anti-nuclear sanctions against his government would have no effect on his government's policies. Appearing calm and self-assured, he said he was pleased by the release of American hiker Sarah Shourd.

It's fair for smaller countries to turn to international conventions

MINISTER Mentor Lee Kuan Yew supports the use of international conventions to solve border disputes, especially when the countries involved are not of equal standing.

By way of illustration, he said it was "fair" for smaller countries like Vietnam to resolve disputes with China using conventions like Unclos – the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

He made the point at a dialogue of the Russia-Singapore Business Forum yesterday, when he was asked by former Japanese senator Kotaro Tamura to comment on the ongoing China-Japan dispute.

Mr Tamura, in his question, made his feelings clear, describing China as a "teenager" in its handling of the situation.

Adding that China was also pushing around other countries like those in South-east Asia, he asked if it was a good idea for countries with potential border problems to team up and take China into a multilateral negotiation.

Mr Lee, in his response, noted that multiparty negotiations had been proposed by United States Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in a visit to Vietnam this July.

But Mrs Clinton's statement had upset China, he added.

Mr Lee said: "It was a really quiet statement but I think it also drew a line, a red line which will not make the Chinese very happy.

"As you can see its foreign minister says it's none of America's business, it is a bilateral matter with the Philippines, with Brunei, with Vietnam."

The three South-east Asian countries, China and some others have all laid claim – either in whole or in part – to the Spratly Islands in the South China Sea.

But any bilateral negotiation with China is unlikely to be a fair fight, he said.

"So if you deal with China, and Vietnam with 100 million (people) and they've got 1,300 million, where is your punching power?" he asked.

He cited a 2008 dispute over a deal Vietnam made with US oil giant ExxonMobil to do oil exploration in contested waters.

"The Chinese told ExxonMobil: 'Move on or you'll get no business from China.' So ExxonMobil moved on," he said. That is why, he said, a multilateral, Unclos- based solution was just.

He stressed that negotiations needed to be based on internationally accepted rules.

Mrs Clinton, he said, probably did not act independently when making the statement in Hanoi and would have consulted her country's national security lobby and even the President.

He said the US policy made it clear that territorial claims were more complex than producing a map with dotted lines and saying: "All this is mine".

"I mean who produces this map? What is the authenticity of this map? Who kept it? And even if you can prove its antiquity, what does it show?

"It shows that at that time these countries were not independent and (were) under French, American or British or other rule and so they could not object.

"But now they're independent and they're entitled to protest. It's within their EEZ (exclusive economic zone); it's within their territorial waters," he said.

Mr Lee said the points made by the US in Hanoi draw an "important line against bilateral dealings which are unequal".

He also spoke on Japan's current spat with China, the worst between the two countries in years, which was sparked earlier this month when Japan detained a Chinese ship captain following a sea collision near the disputed Senkaku islands.

Japan, however, released the captain on Saturday.

Mr Lee felt that moving to settle the dispute was probably the right thing to do.

He said: "Supposing he (Japanese PM Naoto Kan) decided to do otherwise, then what? Then the Senkaku islands will become a dispute. Then they will send their navy there. Then you will send your navy there.

"And normally (you) have better ships than they have. But they will build an aircraft carrier. So in 10 years they have a bigger fleet than you have, so you have to factor that into your calculation.

"These are the realities of power."

Flotilla Organizer Claims Ship Will Not Sail Directly to Gaza

(U) Coordinator of the Mariam's efforts, Samar al-Hajj, told the LBC television channel on Saturday that contacts are ongoing with countries near Gaza in order to acquire permission for the ship to dock at one of their ports. She complained, "It seems as if there is universal war against us....We will not allow anyone to cancel the ship's trip." She added that the ship will not head to Gaza directly from Tripoli, stressing, "The ship cannot be the reason for the start of a war."

Subject: (AP) Interview: Ahmadinejad says future is Iran's- added quotes

NEW YORK (AP) - Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said "the future belongs to Iran," and challenged the United States to accept that his country has a major role in the world. The comments came in an hour-long interview with The Associated Press on the first day of his visit to the United States to attend the annual general assembly of the United Nations this week. He insisted that his government does not want an atomic bomb- something he has said in the past- and that Iran is only seeking peace and a nuclear-free world. He gave no indication of when Iran would resume talks on its nuclear program and said any anti-nuclear sanctions against his government would have no effect on his government's policies. Appearing calm and self-assured, the Iranian president said he was pleased about the release of American hiker Sarah Shourd from a prison in Tehran, but said her two companions still in prison would have to prove their innocence on charges that they illegally crossed into the country. "The United States' administrations... must recognize that Iran is a big power," he said. "Having said that, we consider ourselves to be a human force and a cultural power and hence a friend of other nations. We have never sought to dominate others or to violate the rights of any other country. "Those who insist on having hostilities with us, kill and destroy the option of friendship of us in the future, which is unfortunate because it is clear the future belongs to Iran and that enmities will be fruitless- and hence sanctions, too, will be ineffective." He added: "If they were to be effective, I should not be sitting here right now." Ahmadinejad asserted that international nuclear regulators had never found proof that Iran is pursuing an atomic bomb. "We are not afraid of nuclear weapons. The point is that if we had in fact wanted to build a nuclear bomb, we are brave enough to say that we want it. But we never do that. We are saying that the arsenal of nuclear bombs (worldwide) have to be destroyed as well," he said. The U.S. accuses Iran of hiding plans to build a nuclear bomb; Iran denies that and says it's working only toward building nuclear power plants. On the case of the American hikers, Ahmadinejad said, "We're very glad that that lady was released. (Due) to the humanitarian perspective of the Islamic Republic chose to adopt on the subject, she was released on bail. And we hope that the other two will soon be able to prove and provide evidence to the court that they had no ill intention in crossing the border, so that their release can also be secured." Tying the case to Iran's assertion that some of its citizens are being held unjustly in the United States, he said, "It certainly does not give us joy when we see people in prison, wherever in the world that may be, and even when we think of prisoners here." His answers were translated from Farsi by an Iranian translator, but Ahmadinejad appeared to be following the questions in English and occasionally corrected his interpreter. Asked about retired FBI employee Robert Levinson, who disappeared during a trip to Iran in 2007, Ahmadinejad appeared to suggest that he may have been Iran for suspicious reasons. "The U.S. government had informed us of this situation and we announced that we are unaware of it. We agreed to establish a joint information committee to trace... his whereabouts. "Of course if it becomes clear what his goal was, or if he was indeed on a mission, then perhaps specific assistance can be given," the Iranian said. "For example, if he had plans to visit with a group or an individual or go to another country, he would be easier to trace in that instance." Levinson was last seen on Iran's Kish island in March 2007 where he had gone to seek information on cigarette smuggling for a client of his security firm. He had been an FBI agent in New York and Florida before retiring in 1998. He has not been seen since. Iran says it has no information on him.

Owen Paterson and Peter Power (michael cannot come now) are only attending the first remarks by the Secretary and not participating in the conference. Owen is not attending the dinner because he has to go back for the Cabinet mtg next day, so having his Opposition counterpart there would obviously cause protocol issues as you can appreciate. It also would raise questions in the Irish government as to why the opposition representative from their side wasn't invited either. Finally, there just isn't enough time to rewind the tape on all of this with just one working day left between now and the event.

BRUSSELS (AP) - Federal prosecutors in Belgium say 10 suspects have been detained after an anti-terror sweep in Belgium, the Netherlands and Germany. The prosecutors say in a statement those targeted in the sweeps were suspected of planning a possible attack in Belgium. Others were suspected recruiters for an alleged Chechen terror organization. Ten homes were searched in the three nations, and 10 suspects of Belgian, Dutch, Moroccan or Russian nationality were detained. The statement said that investigation had previously already led to arrests in Spain, Morocco and Saudi Arabia.

Effort for Liberal Balance to G.O.P. Groups Begins

By MICHAEL LUO

In what may prove a significant development for the 2012 elections, David Brock, a prominent Democratic political operative, says he has amassed $4 million in pledges over the last few weeks and is moving quickly to hire a staff to set up what he hopes will become a permanent liberal counterweight over the airwaves to the Republican-leaning outside groups that spent so heavily on this year's midterm elections.

Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, a former Maryland lieutenant governor and the eldest of Robert F. Kennedy's 11 children, has agreed to serve as the chairwoman of the group, which will be called American Bridge, lending to the still extremely nascent undertaking the weight of what remains one of the most significant families in Democratic politics.

Leading Democratic donors who have already pledged money to the group include Rob McKay, heir to the Taco Bell fortune and chairman of the Democracy Alliance, a partnership of wealthy liberal donors; Robert Dyson, who heads Dyson-Kissner-Moran, a takeover and acquisitions firm in New York City; and Marcia L. Carsey, a television producer who gave $1 million to Democratic outside groups in 2004.

Mr. Brock said in an interview that he planned to formally file papers with the Federal Election Commission on Tuesday to set up American Bridge as what is known as an independent-expenditure-only political action committee, meaning it will be able to take in contributions of unlimited size from individuals and corporations but must regularly disclose its donors.

Certain to set off debate, however, is that Mr. Brock appears to be positioning his new organization so that fund-raising consultants can raise money for Democratic-oriented media efforts not just through American Bridge but also via one of the nonprofit organizations Mr. Brock currently runs, Media Matters Action Network, which does not disclose its donors.

The action network, which tracks conservative politicians and advocacy organizations, is organized as a 501(c)(4) nonprofit group and is set to take on an expanded role in the 2012 elections, including potentially running television ads, according to an internal draft concept paper about American Bridge's and Media Matter Action Network's plans obtained by The New York Times.

Mr. Brock said that "money is money," and that he would actively solicit donors for both entities and, in the end, the media spending would be apportioned accordingly.

The moves by Mr. Brock in recent weeks make his the most concrete effort so far on the part of Democratic activists to establish some kind of centralized structure that they hope will become the left's answer in 2012 to such groups on the right as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Crossroads and others, which significantly outspent Democratic-leaning outside groups this year. It is too early to say whether Mr. Brock's group will emerge as the go-to vehicle for giant contributions on the left.

Mr. Brock led a much-heralded independent group in the 2008 presidential election that failed to gain much traction after the Obama campaign indicated that it preferred that donors not give to such groups.

But Mr. Brock, a former conservative journalist who publicly disavowed the right in the late 1990s, is a respected political player, who has drawn plaudits from liberal donors for his running of the array of groups under the Media Matters umbrella.

Mr. Brock pointed out that the various groups associated with Media Matters had raised a combined $23 million this year. Its backers include major Democratic donors like George Soros, the billionaire who recently announced he had given $1 million to the group; Peter B. Lewis, the billionaire chairman of Progressive Insurance, who, like Mr. Soros, gave more than $20 million to Democratic-oriented groups in 2004; and the Hollywood producer Steve Bing.

"My donor base already constitutes the major individual players who have historically given hundreds of millions of dollars to these types of efforts," Mr. Brock said. "They just need to be asked, and I have no doubt they will step up at this critical time."

There also seems to be widespread agreement among Democratic activists and donors on the need for such groups to be more heavily involved in the 2012 elections.

White House officials have signaled in recent weeks that the Obama administration would not object to Democratic-leaning outside groups getting involved in the 2012 elections, a change from the Obama campaign's attitude toward such groups in 2008. But they have also indicated that they would prefer that the names of donors be disclosed.

The lack of disclosure among Republican-leaning outside groups became a central Democratic talking point this year as spending by outside groups on the right exploded before the midterm elections.

But the overriding desire on the part of liberal donors and activists to hold on to the White House and to win back some of what was lost in the House and Senate may trump those principles. Most political operatives agree that it is easier to raise money if the option of offering anonymity is available.

"It would be sort of a funny principle to stand on, to essentially tie one hand behind your back," Mr. McKay said.

Besides Mr. Brock, numerous Democratic activists have been in discussions about setting up similar independent efforts. On Monday, for instance, Steve Rosenthal, who was the chief executive of America Coming Together, a Democratic fund-raising vehicle that focused on voter mobilization in the 2004 election, convened a group of political operatives, many of whom were active in that election, at a Washington restaurant to discuss what might be done for 2012.

No one, however, has apparently gone as far as Mr. Brock in terms of raising money and formally setting up an organization.

Mr. Brock said the $4 million in pledges the group has collected so far should be deposited in its bank account by the end of the first quarter of 2011.

By way of comparison, America's Families First Action Fund, one of the major Democratic independent efforts in House races this year, raised just over $4 million for the entire cycle up until mid-October.

The internal concept paper for American Bridge lays out a series of priorities for the next year, including initially focusing on attacking vulnerable Republicans in the Senate and the House, as a prelude to major spending in 2012.

The action network, which tracks conservative politicians and advocacy organizations, is organized as a 501(c)(4) nonprofit group and is set to take on an expanded role in the 2012 elections, including potentially running television ads, according to an internal draft concept paper about American Bridge's and Media Matter Action Network's plans obtained by The New York Times.

Mr. Brock said that "money is money," and that he would actively solicit donors for both entities and, in the end, the media spending would be apportioned accordingly.

The moves by Mr. Brock in recent weeks make his the most concrete effort so far on the part of Democratic activists to establish some kind of centralized structure that they hope will become the left's answer in 2012 to such groups on the right as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce <http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/organizations/c/chamber_of_commerce_us/index.html?inline=nyt-org> , American Crossroads and others, which significantly outspent Democratic-leaning outside groups this year. It is too early to say whether Mr. Brock's group will emerge as the go-to vehicle for giant contributions on the left.

Mr. Brock led a much-heralded independent group in the 2008 presidential election that failed to gain much traction after the Obama campaign indicated that it preferred that donors not give to such groups.

But Mr. Brock, a former conservative journalist who publicly disavowed the right in the late 1990s, is a respected political player, who has drawn plaudits from liberal donors for his running of the array of groups under the Media Matters umbrella.

Mr. Brock pointed out that the various groups associated with Media Matters had raised a combined $23 million this year. Its backers include major Democratic donors like George Soros <http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/people/s/george_soros/index.html?inline=nyt-per> , the billionaire who recently announced he had given $1 million to the group; Peter B. Lewis <http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/people/l/peter_b_lewis/index.html?inline=nyt-per> , the billionaire chairman of Progressive Insurance, who, like Mr. Soros, gave more than $20 million to Democratic-oriented groups in 2004; and the Hollywood producer Steve Bing.

"My donor base already constitutes the major individual players who have historically given hundreds of millions of dollars to these types of efforts," Mr. Brock said. "They just need to be asked, and I have no doubt they will step up at this critical time."

There also seems to be widespread agreement among Democratic activists and donors on the need for such groups to be more heavily involved in the 2012 elections.

White House officials have signaled in recent weeks that the Obama administration would not object to Democratic-leaning outside groups getting involved in the 2012 elections, a change from the Obama campaign's attitude toward such groups in 2008. But they have also indicated that they would prefer that the names of donors be disclosed.

The lack of disclosure among Republican-leaning outside groups became a central Democratic talking point this year as spending by outside groups on the right exploded before the midterm elections.

But the overriding desire on the part of liberal donors and activists to hold on to the White House and to win back some of what was lost in the House and Senate may trump those principles.

Most political operatives agree that it is easier to raise money if the option of offering anonymity is available.

"It would be sort of a funny principle to stand on, to essentially tie one hand behind your back," Mr. McKay said.

Besides Mr. Brock, numerous Democratic activists have been in discussions about setting up similar independent efforts.

On Monday, for instance, Steve Rosenthal, who was the chief executive of America Coming Together, a Democratic fund-raising vehicle that focused on voter mobilization in the 2004 election, convened a group of political operatives, many of whom were active in that election, at a Washington restaurant to discuss what might be done for 2012.

No one, however, has apparently gone as far as Mr. Brock in terms of raising money and formally setting up an organization.

Mr. Brock said the $4 million in pledges the group has collected so far should be deposited in its bank account by the end of the first quarter of 2011.

By way of comparison, America's Families First Action Fund, one of the major Democratic independent efforts in House races this year, raised just over $4 million for the entire cycle up until mid-October.

The internal concept paper for American Bridge lays out a series of priorities for the next year, including initially focusing on attacking vulnerable Republicans in the Senate and the House, as a prelude to major spending in 2012.

Hearing from some sources that Anwar Ibrahim has linked to AQ financiers. Apparently the Saudis are onto this and showed the US a dossier about this. Do you know anything about it? Is this the real reason why her meeting with him was cancelled?

US Election And The Fed
Welcome To The New (Old) World

September 19, 2010

One of the main debates inside senior Fed offices is how much they may have to balance a much more conservative fiscal policy if the Republicans take over. This is the most important question facing officials on both sides of the fence (far more than squiggles and whirls of monthly numbers).

But it's not just spending and taxes, important as they are, it's also implementation of Reg Reform and Health Care Reform. All of that is going to change after November. Here are the details.

Amid the snarkiness about how crazy the Tea Party candidates may be (and, as you know, we LOVE snarkiness) two things should not be lost:

1. The President has lost control of the spending and tax agenda
2. The President has lost control of implementing the Reg Reform and health care legislation Congress pushed through.

All polling from both parties and independent sources point strongly to the Republicans taking over the House. Although they are less likely to take over the Senate, they will be able to gain effective control of spending, taxes and large scale administrative reforms.

Let's start with spending:

The basic fact is that all spending has to be approved by Congress and it starts with the House. As we wrote nearly a week ago, House Republican Leader Boehner and his senior staff have made it clear to us that they would like to freeze spending at 2008 levels with an annual cost savings of $340 billion. This will be one of the top Republican priorities.

Freezing spending at 2008 levels will not happen. However, even in the unlikely event the Republicans do not take over the House the budget will -- at most -- be frozen at or near FY 2010 levels (i.e. the last time money was formally appropriated).

Since there have been no spending bills approved and the fiscal year starts in October, the Congress has to pass a "continuing resolution" that keeps the government running until specific appropriations are made (the 1995 government shutdown happened because there were no appropriations and no continuing resolution...the government literally runs out of spending authority).

Congress will pass a CR in the next few weeks and it will most likely run through the formation of the new Congress (say February or March) next year. They could only do it through the lame duck session, but that would be cutting it close and too cute.

Because the new Congress – even if the Republicans fail to take full control of the House – will be dominated by fiscal conservatives, Boehner's CR idea will have traction. The Senate will make it more moderate, but then it will be up to the President to veto it and thus shut down government or sign it and take the hit.

In turn that does two things: (1) it frees up money for the Bush tax rollovers and (2) it helps the plan to slow or freeze implementation of the reg reform and health care reform bills.

The first part is obvious. The second may be less so. People forget that implementation of these rules requires staff increases, staff reg writing, etc and that's money. By freezing spending at previous levels you freeze the ability to hire new staff and you seriously obstruct the new rule writing process.

Add to that Boehner's commitment to overturn the two major regulatory reforms and you've got a tidal wave of indecision and paralysis (Jesus, talk about mixed metaphors although it would be interesting to see one of those).

The hearings he will announce and simply the chilling effect of him threatening to overturn the laws will accomplish ninety-percent of what he wants to get done, and potentially give the courts time to strike down parts of the health care bill now under appeal.

THE SENATE

While everyone has written off Republican control of the Senate (we haven't), the attention should be on what the Senate will look like even if the consensus of 52-54 Democratic majority prevails.

The point is how the US Senate will function in January 2011 given its new membership. We got a glimpse of what this would look like when moderate Republican Scott Brown was elected and the health care public option was panned and Reg Reform was trimmed around the edges.

The incoming crop of members are much more ardent on government spending, the debt, taxes and regulatory oversight. They will make Boehner's job much easier

Take a quick look at the new members (and the several they will marry up with once they are sworn into office).

While some of these candidates are replacing Republican open seats, all of them are generally considered more conservative than their predecessors:

1. ck (CO) – likely winner
2. Toomey (PA) – likely winner
3. Rubio (FL) – likely winner
4. Ayotte (NH) – likely winner
5. Blunt (MO) – likely winner
6. Portman (OH) –likely winner
7. Coats (IN) – likely winner
8. Paul (KY) – likely winner
9. Miller (AK) – likely winner
10. Lee (UT) – likely winner
11. Boozman (AR) – likely winner
12. Hoeven (ND) – likely winner
13. Kirk (IL) – 50/50 (lean GOP)
14. Angle (NV) – 50/50 tossup

There are several other Democrat-controlled seats that remain in play (CA, WI, WA, and CT). These races continue to develop and we will report more as the picture on Election Day becomes clearer.
These likely new members will join the following traditional budget trouble-makers in the US Senate:

1. DeMint (SC)
2. Coburn (OK)
3. Inhofe (OK)
4. McConnell (KY)
5. Kyl (AZ)
6. McCain (AZ)
7. Thune (SD)

8. Crapo (ID)
9. Vitter (LA)
10. Burr (NC)

One aggressive Senator can slow the body to a snail's pace, and Republicans operated efficiently as a minority party with only 41 votes total. In January, there will be at least 22 new and existing serious road blocks now patrolling the Senate Floor. The Republican pick-ups will make getting to 60 votes for cloture impossible on spending bills.

Welcome to the new reality.

Declaring America's Stand on Middle East Peace

By Chester A. Crocker, Scott B. Lasensky and Samuel W. Lewis

Faltering Middle East peace talks need a jolt. Washington has a powerful option for moving the process forward: taking a firm stand on how to end the conflict.

An American declaration of principles—carefully crafted and properly marketed--could spark a debate and thereby change the political calculus for leaders. As a mediator and a world power, one of America's strongest assets is the ability to legitimize ideas and then rally others in support. A central role for the U.S. in this conflict must be to define the zone of negotiability.

This does not mean imposing peace. Rather, it would be a statement of the basic principles the U.S. believes can guide the parties toward a negotiated solution. America has long declared its support for "two states," but must now say more about what that means in practice.

Even if the current talks resume, without American ideas the parties are unlikely to agree on the broad trade-offs necessary to reach a peace deal. A quick deal on "borders and security," as many have proposed, is itself unlikely without Washington addressing the end-game. Otherwise, both sides would be too exposed on issues set for later discussion, like Jerusalem and refugees. Opinion polling has consistently showed that support for peace is strongest when all the core issues are addressed.

An American statement of principles would mobilize regional support. It would provide, for the first time, a public framework for engaging sponsors of the Arab Peace Initiative. It would also strengthen our ability to reassert the importance of a regional support structure for the bilateral negotiations, especially by reviving multilateral contacts and meetings involving Israelis and their neighbors from throughout the region. Moreover, greater regional engagement on the peace process can carry powerful benefits for regional challenges like the Iranian nuclear program.

A clearer U.S. declaration is also the surest way to protect prospects for a two-state solution from an unrelenting onslaught on the ground that pushes the parties away from a peace deal. An American set of ideas would anchor present-day demands on issues like Jerusalem, security and settlements in a clear vision of the future.

Perhaps most urgently, it would broaden the debate from the narrow confines of the settlements question.

At a minimum, the American declaration should be based on the 1967 lines, with agreed territorial swaps; support a compromise on Jerusalem that allows for two capitals for two states; include provisions about security limitations and guarantees; reiterate America's support for an agreed solution to the refugee problem; and reaffirm our long-standing commitment to the State of Israel. But American principles should also include some caveat, given that our ultimate interest is in an agreed, viable solution—not in any particular formula.

What would it take for American ideas to succeed? Unlike some past efforts, Washington should not try to 'pre-cook' this declaration with one or more parties or to choreograph their reactions. In fact, the U.S. statement of principles would be explicitly described as what our own country believes in and can support; and by implication cannot support. Thus, the U.S. statement would not be designed to achieve immediate approval or adoption by the parties. Its purpose would be to clarify where America stands, how we define our interests and what we can work for. It would aim at influencing the climate of thinking in the region, sobering up those with illusions and encouraging those who need our support.

Timing and context are of course key considerations. Assuming the current gridlock in negotiations persists, some time must elapse until our election results have been digested, here and abroad, and before public attention can be redirected toward the foreboding and increasingly dangerous Arab-Israel stalemate.

A presidential speech will then be essential to dramatize the seriousness of our purpose and to lay out the principles. It should be immediately followed by a major, high level diplomatic effort to persuade key Middle East leaders and our Quartet and UN allies of our genuine desire to regionalize the peacemaking effort. To maximize support from key members of Congress, the speech should occur before Congress adjourns. No further consultation with the stalemated parties beyond the routine should precede the speech, and leaks of its contents must be kept to an absolute minimum if our purpose is not to be undermined.

The speech could usefully also remove some of the veil of silence that shrouds breakthroughs in past negotiations; for example, progress in the Annapolis process.

As for the substance, in its endorsement of a two-state solution and comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, the Obama Administration has hinted that a Palestinian settlement should also accompany normalized relations between Israel and the Arab states, putting a broader framing around what has traditionally been defined as a conflict between Israel and its immediate neighbors. The normalization piece of the puzzle should be more fully articulated as part of a new strategy based on presenting American ideas to the parties. It is a way to entice skeptical Israelis, but it also leads back to a long overdue need for Washington to engage on the Arab Peace Initiative.

If the U.S. puts forward its own peace principles, American leadership can ensure that any diplomatic process is defined by as clear a picture as possible of what the parties can expect to gain through a negotiated settlement, and of what they will never gain without one.

Skeptics say it is too risky to present American ideas to the parties, that it would pull the rug out from under current leaders, exposing them to withering domestic criticism. Others argue that it will galvanize obstructionists, not those who support compromise, and could very well precipitate a crisis on the ground. Others simply worry about the cost to American prestige should any of the key players react negatively. But the risks are overstated, and a complete collapse of the process would be far more dangerous, particularly as the strategic environment shifts in favor of regional forces that seek to undermine, rather than promote peace.

America can and must do more than limit itself to managing a conflict that has all too often upended our shared interests in peace and stability.

This does not mean imposing peace. Rather, it would be a statement of the basic principles the U.S. believes can guide the parties toward a negotiated solution. America has long declared its support for "two states," but must now say more about what that means in practice.

Even if the current talks resume, without American ideas the parties are unlikely to agree on the broad trade-offs necessary to reach a peace deal. A quick deal on "borders and security," as many have proposed, is itself unlikely without Washington addressing the end-game. Otherwise, both sides would be too exposed on issues set for later discussion, like Jerusalem and refugees. Opinion polling has consistently showed that support for peace is strongest when all the core issues are addressed.

An American statement of principles would mobilize regional support. It would provide, for the first time, a public framework for engaging sponsors of the Arab Peace Initiative. It would also strengthen our ability to reassert the importance of a regional support structure for the bilateral negotiations, especially by reviving multilateral contacts and meetings involving Israelis and their neighbors from throughout the region. Moreover, greater regional engagement on the peace process can carry powerful benefits for regional challenges like the Iranian nuclear program.

A clearer U.S. declaration is also the surest way to protect prospects for a two-state solution from an unrelenting onslaught on the ground that pushes the parties away from a peace deal. An American set of ideas would anchor present-day demands on issues like Jerusalem, security and settlements in a clear vision of the future.

Perhaps most urgently, it would broaden the debate from the narrow confines of the settlements question.

At a minimum, the American declaration should be based on the 1967 lines, with agreed territorial swaps; support a compromise on Jerusalem that allows for two capitals for two states; include provisions about security limitations and guarantees; reiterate America's support for an agreed solution to the refugee problem; and reaffirm our long-standing commitment to the State of Israel. But American principles should also include some caveat, given that our ultimate interest is in an agreed, viable solution—not in any particular formula.

What would it take for American ideas to succeed? Unlike some past efforts, Washington should not try to 'pre-cook' this declaration with one or more parties or to choreograph their reactions. In fact, the U.S. statement of principles would be explicitly described as what our own country believes in and can support; and by implication cannot support. Thus, the U.S. statement would not be designed to achieve immediate approval or adoption by the parties. Its purpose would be to clarify where America stands, how we define our interests and what we can work for. It would aim at influencing the climate of thinking in the region, sobering up those with illusions and encouraging those who need our support.

Timing and context are of course key considerations. Assuming the current gridlock in negotiations persists, some time must elapse until our election results have been digested, here and abroad, and before public attention can be redirected toward the foreboding and increasingly dangerous Arab-Israel stalemate.

A presidential speech will then be essential to dramatize the seriousness of our purpose and to lay out the principles. It should be immediately followed by a major, high level diplomatic effort to persuade key Middle East leaders and our Quartet and UN allies of our genuine desire to regionalize the peacemaking effort. To maximize support from key members of Congress, the speech should occur before Congress adjourns. No further consultation with the stalemated parties beyond the routine should precede the speech, and leaks of its contents must be kept to an absolute minimum if our purpose is not to be undermined.

The speech could usefully also remove some of the veil of silence that shrouds breakthroughs in past negotiations; for example, progress in the Annapolis process.

As for the substance, in its endorsement of a two-state solution and comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, the Obama Administration has hinted that a Palestinian settlement should also accompany normalized relations between Israel and the Arab states, putting a broader framing around what has traditionally been defined as a conflict between Israel and its immediate neighbors. The normalization piece of the puzzle should be more fully articulated as part of a new strategy based on presenting American ideas to the parties. It is a way to entice skeptical Israelis, but it also leads back to a long overdue need for Washington to engage on the Arab Peace Initiative.

If the U.S. puts forward its own peace principles, American leadership can ensure that any diplomatic process is defined by as clear a picture as possible of what the parties can expect to gain through a negotiated settlement, and of what they will never gain without one.

Skeptics say it is too risky to present American ideas to the parties, that it would pull the rug out from under current leaders, exposing them to withering domestic criticism. Others argue that it will galvanize obstructionists, not those who support compromise, and could very well precipitate a crisis on the ground. Others simply worry about the cost to American prestige should any of the key players react negatively. But the risks are overstated, and a complete collapse of the process would be far more dangerous, particularly as the strategic environment shifts in favor of regional forces that seek to undermine, rather than promote peace.

America can and must do more than limit itself to managing a conflict that has all too often upended our shared interests in peace and stability.

Following this morning's meetings I activated my four legal eagles on the SP staff – Peter Harrell, Jen Harris, Bill Burke White, and Catherine Powell (that includes two law profs and two Yale law grads who certainly could be law profs). They in turn reached out to people at the Berkmann Center at Harvard and other experts, working together with Alec Ross. Alec has been particularly useful in terms not only of his knowledge but also his sensitivity to how anything we might try to do could impact our own internet freedom agenda. The result is the attached memo, which has one interesting legal approach and I think some very good suggestions about how to handle our public diplomacy. AM

Subject: Iraq govt formation

Basic principles for NYT ed board:

US principles: gov't should reflect election results; gov't must have significant role for Iraqiyya (good for internal stability and regional integration); gov't formation should include a strong reform and power-sharing understanding; we want a gov't as committed to the long-term partnership with us as we are. These are principles backed by all Iraqi leaders, who need to make decisions now to break the deadlock.

We have no candidate for PM. We have encouraged Allawi's Iraqiyya and Maliki's State of Law to see if they can work together, because that reflects the votes and would give the new gov't a healthy majority. But who fills what position -- that's for the Iraqis to decide.

There may be other ways to have a gov't. But this should happen soon. Where we would have concerns: if the Sadrists end up with the power to veto gov't decisions or to topple the gov't.

NORFOLK (AP) - A jury in Virginia has convicted five Somali men of piracy for their attack on a U.S. Navy ship off the coast of Africa.

Jurors returned the guilty verdict November 24 in Norfolk after deliberating 10 hours over two days. The verdict is the first piracy conviction in a U.S. courtroom in nearly 200 years.

The conviction carries a mandatory life term.

The defendants were charged with attacking the USS Nicholas on April 1 as it patrolled off the coast of Somalia.

The men claimed they were fishermen who were kidnapped, beaten and forced into piracy.

SEOUL (Reuters) – South Korean President Lee Myung-bak called an emergency meeting early November 25 to check on the economic impact from the worst North Korean attacks on civilians in the South since the 1950-53 Korean War. The presidential office said the meeting of senior security and economic officials was due to start at 0800 local (2300 GMT November 24) but did not provide more details. Local media reported the meeting was aimed at discussing ways to prevent tensions with North Korea from hurting the economy, which is becoming more reliant on domestic consumer spending for growth as exports are beginning to lose steam.

SEOUL (Reuters) – North Korean leader Kim Jong-il and his son and successor Jong-un visited the artillery base from where shells were fired at a South Korean island just hours before the attack, South Korean media reported on November 25. North Korea's attack on Yeonpyeong Island that killed two South Korean marines and two civilians November 22 was probably ordered by Kim Jong-il himself, the Joongang Daily quoted a well-informed government source as saying. Seoul government officials contacted by Reuters could not comment on the reports. South Korean media reported the father and son had met General Kim Kyok-sik, the commander of the frontline fourth corps in charge of a Navy base in South Hwanghae province, just before the North shelled the island. JoongAng Daily quoted a source as saying that Kim visited the coastal artillery base in Gaemori from where the shells were fired with his son a day before the attack.

Please Pass to the Secretary

Madame Secretary,

A shoot out occurred on August 20 in front of the American School in Monterrey (AFSM), resulting in the death of two bodyguards. An investigation is continuing into the details, but our understanding at this point is that it was an attempted kidnapping targeting the relatives of a local business executive. While it does not appear that U.S. families were targeted, the sharp increase in kidnapping incidents in the Monterrey area, and this event in particular, present a very high risk to the families of U.S. citizens who might be become incidental victims.

U.S. security and law enforcement personnel have engaged local and federal security officials to seek their help on understanding the immediate risks and measures that can be taken. I have urged U.S. families at the Consulate in Monterrey not to send their children to school in the coming days while we review the events that took place on August 20. We also are advising U.S. citizens in the area that we have urged Consulate personnel not to send their children to school while we complete this security review.

I am sure that the warden notice will lead to a rash of press reports on U.S. concerns about security in Monterrey. More broadly, if the government cannot get the kidnappings in Monterrey under control, that may affect our ability to function in Monterrey. I have advised Secretary Espinosa of this, and have sought her help as well to address consulate security.

Consulate personnel are currently on "authorized departure" and have the option to send their families to a U.S. location. Pat Kennedy is in close touch on these matters.

SEOUL (Reuters) - South Korea plans to boost military capability off its west coast, including cancelling an earlier plan to cut down the number of marine troops stationed there, after this week's North Korean attacks, it said on November 25. A presidential office spokesman said the measures were part of the outcome from an emergency meeting presided over by President Lee Myung-bak early November 25.

Please Pass to the Secretary

Madame Secretary,

A shoot out occurred on August 20 in front of the American School in Monterrey (AFSM), resulting in the death of two bodyguards. An investigation is continuing into the details, but our understanding at this point is that it was an attempted kidnapping targeting the relatives of a local business executive. While it does not appear that U.S. families were targeted, the sharp increase in kidnapping incidents in the Monterrey area, and this event in particular, present a very high risk to the families of U.S. citizens who might be become incidental victims.

U.S. security and law enforcement personnel have engaged local and federal security officials to seek their help on understanding the immediate risks and measures that can be taken. I have urged U.S. families at the Consulate in Monterrey not to send their children to school in the coming days while we review the events that took place on August 20. We also are advising U.S. citizens in the area that we have urged Consulate personnel not to send their children to school while we complete this security review.

I am sure that the warden notice will lead to a rash of press reports on U.S. concerns about security in Monterrey. More broadly, if the government cannot get the kidnappings in Monterrey under control, that may affect our ability to function in Monterrey. I have advised Secretary Espinosa of this, and have sought her help as well to address consulate security.

Consulate personnel are currently on "authorized departure" and have the option to send their families to a U.S. location. Pat Kennedy is in close touch on these matters.

Subject: (Reuters) Iraqi PM Maliki asked to form government

BAGHDAD (Reuters) - Iraq's president formally asked Prime Minister Maliki to form a new government, giving him 30 days to choose a cabinet from among Iraq's fractious Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni political factions. The request from President Talabani came two weeks after political leaders reached an agreement to divide up the top government jobs, a deal that put Maliki, a Shiite, on track for a second term as premier. The power-sharing pact, more than eight months after an inconclusive March 7 parliamentary election, offered some hope that Iraq could avoid a return to the sectarian warfare that killed tens of thousands of people at its peak in 2006-07. The deal gave Talabani, a Kurd, another term as president and installed Sunni lawmaker Osama al-Nujaifi as speaker of parliament. Among Maliki's biggest decisions are his choices to head the oil and finance ministries.

BAGHDAD (AP) – Iraq's Prime Minister will travel to Iran and Jordan to seek support for his bid to win a second term more than seven months after national elections. His adviser Ali al-Moussawi said the prime minister will assure the neighboring states that none of Iraq's major political constituencies will be excluded from a new government if they back his second term. Al-Maliki will meet Jordan's King Abdullah II on October 17. He will meet with Iran's President Ahmadinejad and the Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei in Tehran on October 18. He will also visit Turkey and Egypt next week.

On Wednesday, the IEC certifies the final results for 34 out of 35 constituencies in the Parliamentary Elections. The Chairperson of the IEC noted that while results for Ghazni elections were not included in the final results due to "technical issues," they would be announced in the upcoming three to five days. The UN and US embassy issued statements welcoming the results and commending the work of the IEC and ECC. While the Palace has not made any public comments, the Attorney General's office—which has served as the Government's mouthpiece to challenge the election institutions—continues to question the election outcome, criticizing the UN for endorsing the results and vowing that it will continue to investigate allegations of corruption and fraud in the IEC and ECC. In a last minute effort to influence the election announcement, the Attorney General had called for the suspension of the IEC and ECC spokesmen. The embassy has reported that the IEC and ECC have dismissed the Attorney General's comments as political posturing intended to influence the outcome in Ghazni.

Demonstrations have been taking place in various parts of the country are likely to grow, given the Attorney General's comments. The political leadership appears to be split along ethnic lines, with a number of prominent Hazara and Tajik leaders—including Amrullah Saleh and Abdullah Abdullah—insisting that the election results in all 34 provinces being upheld, while Pashtun leaders—including Ashraf Ghani—questioning the legitimacy of the election results in a number of provinces. The President has noted that he will confer with his two Vice Presidents and jihadi leaders before commenting on the results. Vice President Khalili has been the key Hazara leader working with the UN to broker a deal to resolve the Ghazni elections.

Dear Capricia,

As time moves on, I realize I haven't seen you and Mrs. Clinton (Hillary) in a long time, but I think of you both often. I don't know if movie producers are still worthy in your world, but next time you're in NYC I'd love to see you.

I have such fond memories of you guys watching SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE. I made another movie you might like about the ascendancy of King George after Edward abdicated, it's called KINGS SPEECH. The movie brings to light something that many people don't know, which is that King George was a stutterer and he hired an actor to try and help him overcome it. It's a fun movie that is much in the tradition of SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE, again I think you would both like it (and Hillary would approve because it's PG-13 with not too many swear words).

If you have any trips coming up I'd love to send it to you so you guys can watch and give me your opinion. I could also include a copy of THE TILLMAN STORY, that one is obviously not a happy film, but it's an incredibly important one.

JERUSALEM (Reuters) - Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on the Palestinian leadership to renounce an official Palestinian report asserting the Western Wall, one of Judaism's holiest sites, is not Jewish. Al-Mutawakil Taha, deputy information minister in the Palestinian Authority, published a five-page study disputing Jews' reverence of the shrine as a retaining wall of the compound of Biblical Jewish Temples destroyed centuries ago. "Denial of the connection between the Jewish people and the Western Wall by the Palestinian Authority's Ministry of Information is baseless and scandalous," Netanyahu said in a statement issued by the prime minister's office. "The Israeli government expects the leaders of the Palestinian Authority to renounce the document and condemn it, and to stop twisting historical facts," he said. In the report, Taha wrote the Western wall is a "Muslim wall and an integral part of al-Aqsa mosque and Haram al-Sharif," a position echoing past statements by the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. Taha issued the document after Israel approved five-year renovation plan for the Western Wall area.

RAMALLAH (AP) – Saturday's statements seemed intended mainly as a new warning that Washington's peace efforts are in trouble. The Palestinians sharply criticized Israel's plans to build 238 more homes in east Jerusalem. Palestinian President Abbas met with leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organization and his Fatah movement at his headquarters in the West Bank. The Palestinians plan to study their options in coming days, said Yasser Abed Rabbo, the secretary general of the PLO. "These political options include going to the U.N. and to the Security Council," he said. Mohammed Ishtayeh, a senior Fatah official, said the Palestinians will have prepared options by the time they consult with the Arab League in three weeks.

Subject: Insecurity and Monterrey Consulate

Please Pass to the Secretary

Madame Secretary,

A shoot out occurred on August 20 in front of the American School in Monterrey (AFSM), resulting in the death of two bodyguards. An investigation is continuing into the details, but our understanding at this point is that it was an attempted kidnapping targeting the relatives of a local business executive. While it does not appear that U.S. families were targeted, the sharp increase in kidnapping incidents in the Monterrey area, and this event in particular, present a very high risk to the families of U.S. citizens who might be become incidental victims.

U.S. security and law enforcement personnel have engaged local and federal security officials to seek their help on understanding the immediate risks and measures that can be taken. I have urged U.S. families at the Consulate in Monterrey not to send their children to school in the coming days while we review the events that took place on August 20. We also are advising U.S. citizens in the area that we have urged Consulate personnel not to send their children to school while we complete this security review.

I am sure that the warden notice will lead to a rash of press reports on U.S. concerns about security in Monterrey. More broadly, if the government cannot get the kidnappings in Monterrey under control, that may affect our ability to function in Monterrey. I have advised Secretary Espinosa of this, and have sought her help as well to address consulate security.

Consulate personnel are currently on "authorized departure" and have the option to send their families to a U.S. location. Pat Kennedy is in close touch on these matters.

Carlos Pascual

A REPORTER AT LARGE

COVERT OPERATIONS

The billionaire brothers who are waging a war against Obama.

by Jane Mayer AUGUST 30, 2010

David H. Koch in 1996. He and his brother Charles are lifelong libertarians and have quietly given more than a hundred million dollars to right-wing causes.

On May 17th, a black-tie audience at the Metropolitan Opera House applauded as a tall, jovial-looking billionaire took the stage. It was the seventieth annual spring gala of American Ballet Theatre, and David H. Koch was being celebrated for his generosity as a member of the board of trustees; he had recently donated $2.5 million toward the company's upcoming season, and had given many millions before that. Koch received an award while flanked by two of the gala's co-chairs, Blaine Trump, in a peach-colored gown, and Caroline Kennedy Schlossberg, in emerald green. Kennedy's mother, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, had been a patron of the ballet and, coincidentally, the previous owner of a Fifth Avenue apartment that Koch had bought, in 1995, and then sold, eleven years later, for thirty-two million dollars, having found it too small.

The gala marked the social ascent of Koch, who, at the age of seventy, has become one of the city's most prominent philanthropists. In 2008, he donated a hundred million dollars to modernize Lincoln Center's New York State Theatre building, which now bears his name. He has given twenty million to the American Museum of Natural History, whose dinosaur wing is named for him. This spring, after noticing the decrepit state of the fountains outside the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Koch pledged at least ten million dollars for their renovation. He is a trustee of the museum, perhaps the most coveted social prize in the city, and serves on the board of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, where, after he donated more than forty million dollars, an endowed chair and a research center were named for him.

One dignitary was conspicuously absent from the gala: the event's third honorary co-chair, Michelle Obama. Her office said that a scheduling conflict had prevented her from attending. Yet had the First Lady shared the stage with Koch it might have created an awkward tableau. In Washington, Koch is best known as part of a family that has repeatedly funded stealth attacks on the federal government, and on the Obama Administration in particular.

With his brother Charles, who is seventy-four, David Koch owns virtually all of Koch Industries, a conglomerate, headquartered in Wichita, Kansas, whose annual revenues are estimated to be a hundred billion dollars. The company has grown spectacularly since their father, Fred, died, in 1967, and the brothers took charge. The Kochs operate oil refineries in Alaska, Texas, and Minnesota, and control some four thousand miles of pipeline. Koch Industries owns Brawny paper towels, Dixie cups, Georgia-Pacific lumber, Stainmaster carpet, and Lycra, among other products. Forbes ranks it as the second-largest private company in the country, after Cargill, and its consistent profitability has made David and Charles Koch—who, years ago, bought out two other brothers—among the richest men in America. Their combined fortune of thirty-five billion dollars is exceeded only by those of Bill Gates and Warren Buffett.

The Kochs are longtime libertarians who believe in drastically lower personal and corporate taxes, minimal social services for the needy, and much less oversight of industry—especially environmental regulation. These views dovetail with the brothers' corporate interests. In a study released this spring, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst's Political Economy Research Institute named Koch Industries one of the top ten air polluters in the United States. And Greenpeace issued a report identifying the company as a "kingpin of climate science denial." The report showed that, from 2005 to 2008, the Kochs vastly outdid ExxonMobil in giving money to organizations fighting legislation related to climate change, underwriting a huge network of foundations, think tanks, and political front groups. Indeed, the brothers have funded opposition campaigns against so many Obama Administration policies—from health-care reform to the economic-stimulus program—that, in political circles, their ideological network is known as the Kochtopus.

In a statement, Koch Industries said that the Greenpeace report "distorts the environmental record of our companies." And David Koch, in a recent, admiring article about him in New York, protested that the "radical press" had turned his family into "whipping boys," and had exaggerated its influence on American politics. But Charles Lewis, the founder of the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan watchdog group, said, "The Kochs are on a whole different level. There's no one else who has spent this much money. The sheer dimension of it is what sets them apart. They have a pattern of lawbreaking, political manipulation, and obfuscation. I've been in Washington since Watergate, and I've never seen anything like it. They are the Standard Oil of our times."

few weeks after the Lincoln Center gala, the advocacy wing of the Americans for Prosperity Foundation—an organization that David Koch started, in 2004—held a different kind of gathering. Over the July 4th weekend, a summit called Texas Defending the American Dream took place in a chilly hotel ballroom in Austin. Though Koch freely promotes his philanthropic ventures, he did not attend the summit, and his name was not in evidence. And on this occasion the audience was roused not by a dance performance but by a series of speakers denouncing President Barack Obama. Peggy Venable, the organizer of the summit, warned that Administration officials "have a socialist vision for this country."

Five hundred people attended the summit, which served, in part, as a training session for Tea Party activists in Texas. An advertisement cast the event as a populist uprising against vested corporate power. "Today, the voices of average Americans are being drowned out by lobbyists and special interests," it said. "But you can do something about it." The pitch made no mention of its corporate funders. The White House has expressed frustration that such sponsors have largely eluded public notice. David Axelrod, Obama's senior adviser, said, "What they don't say is that, in part, this is a grassroots citizens' movement brought to you by a bunch of oil billionaires."

In April, 2009, Melissa Cohlmia, a company spokesperson, denied that the Kochs had direct links to the Tea Party, saying that Americans for Prosperity is "an independent organization and Koch companies do not in any way direct their activities." Later, she issued a statement: "No funding has been provided by Koch companies, the Koch foundations, or Charles Koch or David Koch specifically to support the tea parties." David Koch told New York, "I've never been to a tea-party event. No one representing the tea party has ever even approached me."

At the lectern in Austin, however, Venable—a longtime political operative who draws a salary from Americans for Prosperity, and who has worked for Koch-funded political groups since 1994—spoke less warily. "We love what the Tea Parties are doing, because that's how we're going to take back America!" she declared, as the crowd cheered. In a subsequent interview, she described herself as an early member of the movement, joking, "I was part of the Tea Party before it was cool!" She explained that the role of Americans for Prosperity was to help "educate" Tea Party activists on policy details, and to give them "next-step training" after their rallies, so that their political energy could be channelled "more effectively." And she noted that Americans for Prosperity had provided Tea Party activists with lists of elected officials to target. She said of the Kochs, "They're certainly our people. David's the chairman of our board. I've certainly met with them, and I'm very appreciative of what they do."

Venable honored several Tea Party "citizen leaders" at the summit. The Texas branch of Americans for Prosperity gave its Blogger of the Year Award to a young woman named Sibyl West. On June 14th, West, writing on her site, described Obama as the "cokehead in chief." In an online thread, West speculated that the President was exhibiting symptoms of "demonic possession (aka schizophrenia, etc.)." The summit featured several paid speakers, including Janine Turner, the actress best known for her role on the television series "Northern Exposure." She declared, "They don't want our children to know about their rights. They don't want our children to know about a God!"

During a catered lunch, Venable introduced Ted Cruz, a former solicitor general of Texas, who told the crowd that Obama was "the most radical President ever to occupy the Oval Office," and had hidden from voters a secret agenda—"the government taking over our economy and our lives." Countering Obama, Cruz proclaimed, was "the epic fight of our generation!" As the crowd rose to its feet and cheered, he quoted the defiant words of a Texan at the Alamo: "Victory, or death!"

Americans for Prosperity has worked closely with the Tea Party since the movement's inception. In the weeks before the first Tax Day protests, in April, 2009, Americans for Prosperity hosted a Web site offering supporters "Tea Party Talking Points." The Arizona branch urged people to send tea bags to Obama; the Missouri branch urged members to sign up for "Taxpayer Tea Party Registration" and provided directions to nine protests. The group continues to stoke the rebellion. The North Carolina branch recently launched a "Tea Party Finder" Web site, advertised as "a hub for all the Tea Parties in North Carolina."

The anti-government fervor infusing the 2010 elections represents a political triumph for the Kochs. By giving money to "educate," fund, and organize Tea Party protesters, they have helped turn their private agenda into a mass movement. Bruce Bartlett, a conservative economist and a historian, who once worked at the National Center for Policy Analysis, a Dallas-based think tank that the Kochs fund, said, "The problem with the whole libertarian movement is that it's been all chiefs and no indians. There haven't been any actual people, like voters, who give a crap about it. So the problem for the Kochs has been trying to create a movement." With the emergence of the Tea Party, he said, "everyone suddenly sees that for the first time there are Indians out there—people who can provide real ideological power." The Kochs, he said, are "trying to shape and control and channel the populist uprising into their own policies."

A Republican campaign consultant who has done research on behalf of Charles and David Koch said of the Tea Party, "The Koch brothers gave the money that founded it. It's like they put the seeds in the ground. Then the rainstorm comes, and the frogs come out of the mud—and they're our candidates!"

The Kochs and their political operatives declined requests for interviews. Instead, a prominent New York public-relations executive who is close with the Kochs put forward two friends: George Pataki, the former governor of New York, and Mortimer Zuckerman, the publisher and real-estate magnate. Pataki, a Republican who received campaign donations from David Koch, called him "a patriot who cares deeply about his country." Zuckerman praised David's "gentle decency" and the "range of his public interests."

The Republican campaign consultant said of the family's political activities, "To call them under the radar is an understatement. They are underground!" Another former Koch adviser said, "They're smart. This right-wing, redneck stuff works for them. They see this as a way to get things done without getting dirty themselves." Rob Stein, a Democratic political strategist who has studied the conservative movement's finances, said that the Kochs are "at the epicenter of the anti-Obama movement. But it's not just about Obama. They would have done the same to Hillary Clinton. They did the same with Bill Clinton. They are out to destroy progressivism."

ddly enough, the fiercely capitalist Koch family owes part of its fortune to Joseph Stalin. Fred Koch was the son of a Dutch printer who settled in Texas and ran a weekly newspaper. Fred attended M.I.T., where he earned a degree in chemical engineering. In 1927, he invented a more efficient process for converting oil into gasoline, but, according to family lore, America's major oil companies regarded him as a threat and shut him out of the industry. Unable to succeed at home, Koch found work in the Soviet Union. In the nineteen-thirties, his company trained Bolshevik engineers and helped Stalin's regime set up fifteen modern oil refineries. Over time, however, Stalin brutally purged several of Koch's Soviet colleagues. Koch was deeply affected by the experience, and regretted his collaboration. He returned to the U.S. In the headquarters of his company, Rock Island Oil & Refining, in Wichita, he kept photographs aimed at proving that some of those Soviet refineries had been destroyed in the Second World War. Gus diZerega, a former friend of Charles Koch, recalled, "As the Soviets became a stronger military power, Fred felt a certain amount of guilt at having helped build them up. I think it bothered him a lot."

In 1958, Fred Koch became one of the original members of the John Birch Society, the arch-conservative group known, in part, for a highly skeptical view of governance and for spreading fears of a Communist takeover. Members considered President Dwight D. Eisenhower to be a Communist agent. In a self-published broadside, Koch claimed that "the Communists have infiltrated both the Democrat and Republican Parties." He wrote admiringly of Benito Mussolini's suppression of Communists in Italy, and disparagingly of the American civil-rights movement. "The colored man looms large in the Communist plan to take over America," he warned. Welfare was a secret plot to attract rural blacks to cities, where they would foment "a vicious race war." In a 1963 speech that prefigures the Tea Party's talk of a secret socialist plot, Koch predicted that Communists would "infiltrate the highest offices of government in the U.S. until the President is a Communist, unknown to the rest of us."

Koch married Mary Robinson, the daughter of a Missouri physician, and they had four sons: Freddie, Charles, and twins, David and William. John Damgard, the president of the Futures Industry Association, was David's schoolmate and friend. He recalled that Fred Koch was "a real John Wayne type." Koch emphasized rugged pursuits, taking his sons big-game hunting in Africa, and requiring them to do farm labor at the family ranch. The Kochs lived in a stone mansion on a large compound across from Wichita's country club; in the summer, the boys could hear their friends splashing in the pool, but they were not allowed to join them. "By instilling a work ethic in me at an early age, my father did me a big favor, although it didn't seem like a favor back then," Charles has written. "By the time I was eight, he made sure work occupied most of my spare time." David Koch recalled that his father also indoctrinated the boys politically. "He was constantly speaking to us children about what was wrong with government," he told Brian Doherty, an editor of the libertarian magazine Reason, and the author of "Radicals for Capitalism," a 2007 history of the libertarian movement. "It's something I grew up with—a fundamental point of view that big government was bad, and imposition of government controls on our lives and economic fortunes was not good."

David attended Deerfield Academy, in Massachusetts, and Charles was sent to military school. Charles, David, and William all earned engineering degrees at their father's alma mater, M.I.T., and later joined the family company. Charles eventually assumed control, with David as his deputy; William's career at the company was less successful. Freddie went to Harvard and studied playwriting at the Yale School of Drama. His father reportedly disapproved of him, and punished him financially. (Freddie, through a spokesperson, denied this.)

In 1967, after Fred Koch died, of a heart attack, Charles renamed the business Koch Industries, in honor of his father. Fred Koch's will made his sons extraordinarily wealthy. David Koch joked about his good fortune in a 2003 speech to alumni at Deerfield, where, after pledging twenty-five million dollars, he was made the school's sole "lifetime trustee." He said, "You might ask: How does David Koch happen to have the wealth to be so generous? Well, let me tell you a story. It all started when I was a little boy. One day, my father gave me an apple. I soon sold it for five dollars and bought two apples and sold them for ten. Then I bought four apples and sold them for twenty. Well, this went on day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, until my father died and left me three hundred million dollars!"

David and Charles had absorbed their father's conservative politics, but they did not share all his views, according to diZerega, who befriended Charles in the mid-sixties, after meeting him while browsing in a John Birch Society bookstore in Wichita. Charles eventually invited him to the Kochs' mansion, to participate in an informal political-discussion group. "It was pretty clear that Charles thought some of the Birch Society was bullshit," diZerega recalled.

DiZerega, who has lost touch with Charles, eventually abandoned right-wing views, and became a political-science professor. He credits Charles with opening his mind to political philosophy, which set him on the path to academia; Charles is one of three people to whom he dedicated his first book. But diZerega believes that the Koch brothers have followed a wayward intellectual trajectory, transferring their father's paranoia about Soviet Communism to a distrust of the U.S. government, and seeing its expansion, beginning with the New Deal, as a tyrannical threat to freedom. In an essay, posted on Beliefnet, diZerega writes, "As state socialism failed . . . the target for many within these organizations shifted to any kind of regulation at all. 'Socialism' kept being defined downwards."

Members of the John Birch Society developed an interest in a school of Austrian economists who promoted free-market ideals. Charles and David Koch were particularly influenced by the work of Friedrich von Hayek, the author of "The Road to Serfdom" (1944), which argued that centralized government planning led, inexorably, to totalitarianism. Hayek's belief in unfettered capitalism has proved inspirational to many conservatives, and to anti-Soviet dissidents; lately, Tea Party supporters have championed his work. In June, the talk-radio host Glenn Beck, who has supported the Tea Party rebellion, promoted "The Road to Serfdom" on his show; the paperback soon became a No. 1 best-seller on Amazon. (Beck appears to be a fan of the Kochs; in the midst of a recent on-air parody of Al Gore, Beck said, without explanation, "I want to thank Charles Koch for this information." Beck declined to elaborate on the relationship.)

Charles and David also became devotees of a more radical thinker, Robert LeFevre, who favored the abolition of the state but didn't like the label "anarchist"; he called himself an "autarchist." LeFevre liked to say that "government is a disease masquerading as its own cure." In 1956, he opened an institution called the Freedom School, in Colorado Springs. Brian Doherty, of Reason, told me that "LeFevre was an anarchist figure who won Charles's heart," and that the school was "a tiny world of people who thought the New Deal was a horrible mistake." According to diZerega, Charles supported the school financially, and even gave him money to take classes there.

Throughout the seventies, Charles and David continued to build Koch Industries. In 1980, William, with assistance from Freddie, attempted to take over the company from Charles, who, they felt, had assumed autocratic control. In retaliation, the company's board, which answered to Charles, fired William. ("Charles runs it all with an iron hand," Bruce Bartlett, the economist, told me.) Lawsuits were filed, with William and Freddie on one side and Charles and David on the other. In 1983, Charles and David bought out their brothers' share in the company for nearly a billion dollars. But the antagonism remained, and litigation continued for seventeen more years, with the brothers hiring rival private investigators; in 1990, they walked past one another with stony expressions at their mother's funeral. Eventually, Freddie moved to Monaco, which has no income tax. He bought historic estates in France, Austria, and elsewhere, filling them with art, antiques, opera scores, and literary manuscripts. William founded his own energy company, Oxbow, and turned to yachting; he spent an estimated sixty-five million dollars to win the America's Cup, in 1992.

With Charles as the undisputed chairman and C.E.O., Koch Industries expanded rapidly. Roger Altman, who heads the investment-banking firm Evercore, told me that the company's performance has been "beyond phenomenal." Charles remained in Wichita, with his wife and two children, guarding his privacy while supporting community charities. David moved to New York City, where he is an executive vice-president of the company and the C.E.O. of its Chemical Technology Group. A financial expert who knows Koch Industries well told me, "Charles is the company. Charles runs it." David, described by associates as "affable" and "a bit of a lunk," enjoyed for years the life of a wealthy bachelor. He rented a yacht in the South of France and bought a waterfront home in Southampton, where he threw parties that the Web site New York Social Diary likened to an "East Coast version of Hugh Hefner's soirées." In 1996, he married Julia Flesher, a fashion assistant. They live in a nine-thousand-square-foot duplex at 740 Park Avenue, with their three children. Though David's manner is more cosmopolitan, and more genial, than that of Charles, Brian Doherty, who has interviewed both brothers, couldn't think of a single issue on which the brothers disagreed.

As their fortunes grew, Charles and David Koch became the primary underwriters of hard-line libertarian politics in America. Charles's goal, as Doherty described it, was to tear the government "out at the root." The brothers' first major public step came in 1979, when Charles persuaded David, then thirty-nine, to run for public office. They had become supporters of the Libertarian Party, and were backing its Presidential candidate, Ed Clark, who was running against Ronald Reagan from the right. Frustrated by the legal limits on campaign donations, they contrived to place David on the ticket, in the Vice-Presidential slot; upon becoming a candidate, he could lavish as much of his personal fortune as he wished on the campaign. The ticket's slogan was "The Libertarian Party has only one source of funds: You." In fact, its primary source of funds was David Koch, who spent more than two million dollars on the effort.

Many of the ideas propounded in the 1980 campaign presaged the Tea Party movement. Ed Clark told The Nation that libertarians were getting ready to stage "a very big tea party," because people were "sick to death" of taxes. The Libertarian Party platform called for the abolition of the F.B.I. and the C.I.A., as well as of federal regulatory agencies, such as the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Energy. The Party wanted to end Social Security, minimum-wage laws, gun control, and all personal and corporate income taxes; it proposed the legalization of prostitution, recreational drugs, and suicide. Government should be reduced to only one function: the protection of individual rights. William F. Buckley, Jr., a more traditional conservative, called the movement "Anarcho-Totalitarianism."

That November, the Libertarian ticket received only one per cent of the vote. The brothers realized that their brand of politics didn't sell at the ballot box. Charles Koch became openly scornful of conventional politics. "It tends to be a nasty, corrupting business," he told a reporter at the time. "I'm interested in advancing libertarian ideas." According to Doherty's book, the Kochs came to regard elected politicians as merely "actors playing out a script." A longtime confidant of the Kochs told Doherty that the brothers wanted to "supply the themes and words for the scripts." In order to alter the direction of America, they had to "influence the areas where policy ideas percolate from: academia and think tanks."

fter the 1980 election, Charles and David Koch receded from the public arena. But they poured more than a hundred million dollars into dozens of seemingly independent organizations. Tax records indicate that in 2008 the three main Koch family foundations gave money to thirty-four political and policy organizations, three of which they founded, and several of which they direct. The Kochs and their company have given additional millions to political campaigns, advocacy groups, and lobbyists. The family's subterranean financial role has fuelled suspicion on the left; Lee Fang, of the liberal blog ThinkProgress, has called the Kochs "the billionaires behind the hate."

Only the Kochs know precisely how much they have spent on politics. Public tax records show that between 1998 and 2008 the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation spent more than forty-eight million dollars. The Claude R. Lambe Charitable Foundation, which is controlled by Charles Koch and his wife, along with two company employees and an accountant, spent more than twenty-eight million. The David H. Koch Charitable Foundation spent more than a hundred and twenty million. Meanwhile, since 1998 Koch Industries has spent more than fifty million dollars on lobbying. Separately, the company's political-action committee, KochPAC, has donated some eight million dollars to political campaigns, more than eighty per cent of it to Republicans. So far in 2010, Koch Industries leads all other energy companies in political contributions, as it has since 2006. In addition, during the past dozen years the Kochs and other family members have personally spent more than two million dollars on political contributions. In the second quarter of 2010, David Koch was the biggest individual contributor to the Republican Governors Association, with a million-dollar donation. Other gifts by the Kochs may be untraceable; federal tax law permits anonymous personal donations to politically active nonprofit groups.

In recent decades, members of several industrial dynasties have spent parts of their fortunes on a conservative agenda. In the nineteen-eighties, the Olin family, which owns a chemicals-and-manufacturing conglomerate, became known for funding right-leaning thinking in academia, particularly in law schools. And during the nineties Richard Mellon Scaife, a descendant of Andrew Mellon, spent millions attempting to discredit President Bill Clinton. Ari Rabin-Havt, a vice-president at the Democratic-leaning Web site Media Matters, said that the Kochs' effort is unusual, in its marshalling of corporate and personal funds: "Their role, in terms of financial commitments, is staggering."

Of course, Democrats give money, too. Their most prominent donor, the financier George Soros, runs a foundation, the Open Society Institute, that has spent as much as a hundred million dollars a year in America. Soros has also made generous private contributions to various Democratic campaigns, including Obama's. But Michael Vachon, his spokesman, argued that Soros's giving is transparent, and that "none of his contributions are in the service of his own economic interests." The Kochs have given millions of dollars to nonprofit groups that criticize environmental regulation and support lower taxes for industry. Gus diZerega, the former friend, suggested that the Kochs' youthful idealism about libertarianism had largely devolved into a rationale for corporate self-interest. He said of Charles, "Perhaps he has confused making money with freedom."

Some critics have suggested that the Kochs' approach has subverted the purpose of tax-exempt giving. By law, charitable foundations must conduct exclusively nonpartisan activities that promote the public welfare. A 2004 report by the National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy, a watchdog group, described the Kochs' foundations as being self-serving, concluding, "These foundations give money to nonprofit organizations that do research and advocacy on issues that impact the profit margin of Koch Industries."

The Kochs have gone well beyond their immediate self-interest, however, funding organizations that aim to push the country in a libertarian direction. Among the institutions that they have subsidized are the Institute for Justice, which files lawsuits opposing state and federal regulations; the Institute for Humane Studies, which underwrites libertarian academics; and the Bill of Rights Institute, which promotes a conservative slant on the Constitution. Many of the organizations funded by the Kochs employ specialists who write position papers that are subsequently quoted by politicians and pundits. David Koch has acknowledged that the family exerts tight ideological control. "If we're going to give a lot of money, we'll make darn sure they spend it in a way that goes along with our intent," he told Doherty. "And if they make a wrong turn and start doing things we don't agree with, we withdraw funding."

he Kochs' subsidization of a pro-corporate movement fulfills, in many ways, the vision laid out in a secret 1971 memo that Lewis Powell, then a Virginia attorney, wrote two months before he was nominated to the Supreme Court. The antiwar movement had turned its anger on defense contractors, such as Dow Chemical, and Ralph Nader was leading a public-interest crusade against corporations. Powell, writing a report for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, urged American companies to fight back. The greatest threat to free enterprise, he warned, was not Communism or the New Left but, rather, "respectable elements of society"—intellectuals, journalists, and scientists. To defeat them, he wrote, business leaders needed to wage a long-term, unified campaign to change public opinion.

Charles Koch seems to have approached both business and politics with the deliberation of an engineer. "To bring about social change," he told Doherty, requires "a strategy" that is "vertically and horizontally integrated," spanning "from idea creation to policy development to education to grassroots organizations to lobbying to litigation to political action." The project, he admitted, was extremely ambitious. "We have a radical philosophy," he said.

In 1977, the Kochs provided the funds to launch the nation's first libertarian think tank, the Cato Institute. According to the Center for Public Integrity, between 1986 and 1993 the Koch family gave eleven million dollars to the institute. Today, Cato has more than a hundred full-time employees, and its experts and policy papers are widely quoted and respected by the mainstream media. It describes itself as nonpartisan, and its scholars have at times been critical of both parties. But it has consistently pushed for corporate tax cuts, reductions in social services, and laissez-faire environmental policies.

When President Obama, in a 2008 speech, described the science on global warming as "beyond dispute," the Cato Institute took out a full-page ad in the Times to contradict him. Cato's resident scholars have relentlessly criticized political attempts to stop global warming as expensive, ineffective, and unnecessary. Ed Crane, the Cato Institute's founder and president, told me that "global-warming theories give the government more control of the economy."

Cato scholars have been particularly energetic in promoting the Climategate scandal. Last year, private e-mails of climate scientists at the University of East Anglia, in England, were mysteriously leaked, and their exchanges appeared to suggest a willingness to falsify data in order to buttress the idea that global warming is real. In the two weeks after the e-mails went public, one Cato scholar gave more than twenty media interviews trumpeting the alleged scandal. But five independent inquiries have since exonerated the researchers, and nothing was found in their e-mails or data to discredit the scientific consensus on global warming.

Nevertheless, the controversy succeeded in spreading skepticism about climate change. Even though the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration recently issued a report concluding that the evidence for global warming is unequivocal, more Americans are convinced than at any time since 1997 that scientists have exaggerated the seriousness of global warming. The Kochs promote this statistic on their company's Web site but do not mention the role that their funding has played in fostering such doubt.

In a 2002 memo, the Republican political consultant Frank Luntz wrote that so long as "voters believe there is no consensus about global warming within the scientific community" the status quo would prevail. The key for opponents of environmental reform, he said, was to question the science—a public-relations strategy that the tobacco industry used effectively for years to forestall regulation. The Kochs have funded many sources of environmental skepticism, such as the Heritage Foundation, which has argued that "scientific facts gathered in the past 10 years do not support the notion of catastrophic human-made warming." The brothers have given money to more obscure groups, too, such as the Independent Women's Forum, which opposes the presentation of global warming as a scientific fact in American public schools. Until 2008, the group was run by Nancy Pfotenhauer, a former lobbyist for Koch Industries. Mary Beth Jarvis, a vice-president of a Koch subsidiary, is on the group's board.

Naomi Oreskes, a professor of history and science studies at the University of California, San Diego, is the co-author of "Merchants of Doubt," a new book that chronicles various attempts by American industry to manipulate public opinion on science. She noted that the Kochs, as the heads of "a company with refineries and pipelines," have "a lot at stake." She added, "If the answer is to phase out fossil fuels, a different group of people are going to be making money, so we shouldn't be surprised that they're fighting tooth and nail."

David Koch told New York that he was unconvinced that global warming has been caused by human activity. Even if it has been, he said, the heating of the planet will be beneficial, resulting in longer growing seasons in the Northern Hemisphere. "The Earth will be able to support enormously more people because far greater land area will be available to produce food," he said. n the mid-eighties, the Kochs provided millions of dollars to George Mason University, in Arlington, Virginia, to set up another think tank. Now known as the Mercatus Center, it promotes itself as "the world's premier university source for market-oriented ideas—bridging the gap between academic ideas and real-world problems." Financial records show that the Koch family foundations have contributed more than thirty million dollars to George Mason, much of which has gone to the Mercatus Center, a nonprofit organization. "It's ground zero for deregulation policy in Washington," Rob Stein, the Democratic strategist, said. It is an unusual arrangement. "George Mason is a public university, and receives public funds," Stein noted. "Virginia is hosting an institution that the Kochs practically control."

The founder of the Mercatus Center is Richard Fink, formerly an economist. Fink heads Koch Industries' lobbying operation in Washington. In addition, he is the president of the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation, the president of the Claude R. Lambe Charitable Foundation, a director of the Fred C. and Mary R. Koch Foundation, and a director and co-founder, with David Koch, of the Americans for Prosperity Foundation.

Fink, with his many titles, has become the central nervous system of the Kochtopus. He appears to have supplanted Ed Crane, the head of the Cato Institute, as the brothers' main political lieutenant. Though David remains on the board at Cato, Charles Koch has fallen out with Crane. Associates suggested to me that Crane had been insufficiently respectful of Charles's management philosophy, which he distilled into a book called "The Science of Success," and trademarked under the name Market-Based Management, or M.B.M. In the book, Charles recommends instilling a company's corporate culture with the competitiveness of the marketplace. Koch describes M.B.M. as a "holistic system" containing "five dimensions: vision, virtue and talents, knowledge processes, decision rights and incentives." A top Cato Institute official told me that Charles "thinks he's a genius. He's the emperor, and he's convinced he's wearing clothes." Fink, by contrast, has been far more embracing of Charles's ideas. (Fink, like the Kochs, declined to be interviewed.)

At a 1995 conference for philanthropists, Fink adopted the language of economics when speaking about the Mercatus Center's purpose. He said that grant-makers should use think tanks and political-action groups to convert intellectual raw materials into policy "products."

The Wall Street Journal has called the Mercatus Center "the most important think tank you've never heard of," and noted that fourteen of the twenty-three regulations that President George W. Bush placed on a "hit list" had been suggested first by Mercatus scholars. Fink told the paper that the Kochs have "other means of fighting [their] battles," and that the Mercatus Center does not actively promote the company's private interests. But Thomas McGarity, a law professor at the University of Texas, who specializes in environmental issues, told me that "Koch has been constantly in trouble with the E.P.A., and Mercatus has constantly hammered on the agency." An environmental lawyer who has clashed with the Mercatus Center called it "a means of laundering economic aims." The lawyer explained the strategy: "You take corporate money and give it to a neutral-sounding think tank," which "hires people with pedigrees and academic degrees who put out credible-seeming studies. But they all coincide perfectly with the economic interests of their funders."

In 1997, for instance, the E.P.A. moved to reduce surface ozone, a form of pollution caused, in part, by emissions from oil refineries. Susan Dudley, an economist who became a top official at the Mercatus Center, criticized the proposed rule. The E.P.A., she argued, had not taken into account that smog-free skies would result in more cases of skin cancer. She projected that if pollution were controlled it would cause up to eleven thousand additional cases of skin cancer each year.

In 1999, the District of Columbia Circuit Court took up Dudley's smog argument. Evaluating the E.P.A. rule, the court found that the E.P.A. had "explicitly disregarded" the "possible health benefits of ozone." In another part of the opinion, the court ruled, 2-1, that the E.P.A. had overstepped its authority in calibrating standards for ozone emissions. As the Constitutional Accountability Center, a think tank, revealed, the judges in the majority had previously attended legal junkets, on a Montana ranch, that were arranged by the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment—a group funded by Koch family foundations. The judges have claimed that the ruling was unaffected by their attendance.

deas don't happen on their own," Matt Kibbe, the president of FreedomWorks, a Tea Party advocacy group, told me. "Throughout history, ideas need patrons." The Koch brothers, after helping to create Cato and Mercatus, concluded that think tanks alone were not enough to effect change. They needed a mechanism to deliver those ideas to the street, and to attract the public's support. In 1984, David Koch and Richard Fink created yet another organization, and Kibbe joined them. The group, Citizens for a Sound Economy, seemed like a grassroots movement, but according to the Center for Public Integrity it was sponsored principally by the Kochs, who provided $7.9 million between 1986 and 1993. Its mission, Kibbe said, "was to take these heavy ideas and translate them for mass America. . . . We read the same literature Obama did about nonviolent revolutions—Saul Alinsky, Gandhi, Martin Luther King. We studied the idea of the Boston Tea Party as an example of nonviolent social change. We learned we needed boots on the ground to sell ideas, not candidates." Within a few years, the group had mobilized fifty paid field workers, in twenty-six states, to rally voters behind the Kochs' agenda. David and Charles, according to one participant, were "very controlling, very top down. You can't build an organization with them. They run it."

Around this time, the brothers faced a political crisis. In 1989, the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs investigated their business and released a scathing report accusing Koch Oil of "a widespread and sophisticated scheme to steal crude oil from Indians and others through fraudulent mismeasuring." The Kochs admitted that they had improperly taken thirty-one million dollars' worth of crude oil, but said that it had been accidental. Charles Koch told committee investigators that oil measurement is "a very uncertain art."

To defend its reputation, Koch Industries hired Robert Strauss, then a premier Washington lobbyist; the company soon opened an office in the city. A grand jury was convened to investigate the allegations, but it eventually disbanded, without issuing criminal charges. According to the Senate report, after the committee hearings Koch operatives delved into the personal lives of committee staffers, even questioning an ex-wife. Senate investigators were upset by the Kochs' tactics. Kenneth Ballen, the counsel to the Senate committee, said, "These people have amassed such unaccountable power!"

By 1993, when Bill Clinton became President, Citizens for a Sound Economy had become a prototype for the kind of corporate-backed opposition campaigns that have proliferated during the Obama era. The group waged a successful assault on Clinton's proposed B.T.U. tax on energy, for instance, running advertisements, staging media events, and targeting opponents. And it mobilized anti-tax rallies outside the Capitol—rallies that NPR described as "designed to strike fear into the hearts of wavering Democrats." Dan Glickman, a former Democratic congressman from Wichita, who supported the B.T.U. tax, recalled, "I'd been in Congress eighteen years. The Kochs actually engaged against me and funded my opponent. They used a lot of resources and effort—their employees, too." Glickman suffered a surprise defeat. "I can't prove it, but I think I was probably their victim," he said.

The Kochs continued to disperse their money, creating slippery organizations with generic-sounding names, and this made it difficult to ascertain the extent of their influence in Washington. In 1990, Citizens for a Sound Economy created a spinoff group, Citizens for the Environment, which called acid rain and other environmental problems "myths." When the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette investigated the matter, it discovered that the spinoff group had "no citizen membership of its own."

In 1997, another Senate investigation began looking into what a minority report called "an audacious plan to pour millions of dollars in contributions into Republican campaigns nationwide without disclosing the amount or source," in order to evade campaign-finance laws. A shell corporation, Triad Management, had paid more than three million dollars for attack ads in twenty-six House races and three Senate races. More than half of the advertising money came from an obscure nonprofit group, the Economic Education Trust. The Senate committee's minority report suggested that "the trust was financed in whole or in part by Charles and David Koch of Wichita, Kansas." The brothers were suspected of having secretly paid for the attack ads, most of which aired in states where Koch Industries did business. In Kansas, where Triad Management was especially active, the funds may have played a decisive role in four of six federal races. The Kochs, when asked by reporters if they had given the money, refused to comment. In 1998, however, the Wall Street Journal confirmed that a consultant on the Kochs' payroll had been involved in the scheme. Charles Lewis, of the Center for Public Integrity, described the scandal as "historic. Triad was the first time a major corporation used a cutout"—a front operation—"in a threatening way. Koch Industries was the poster child of a company run amok."

uring the Clinton Administration, the energy industry faced increased scrutiny and regulation. In the mid-nineties, the Justice Department filed two lawsuits against Koch Industries, claiming that it was responsible for more than three hundred oil spills, which had released an estimated three million gallons of oil into lakes and rivers. The penalty was potentially as high as two hundred and fourteen million dollars. In a settlement, Koch Industries paid a record thirty-million-dollar civil fine, and agreed to spend five million dollars on environmental projects.

In 1999, a jury found Koch Industries guilty of negligence and malice in the deaths of two Texas teen-agers in an explosion that resulted from a leaky underground butane pipeline. (In 2001, the company paid an undisclosed settlement.) And in the final months of the Clinton Presidency the Justice Department levelled a ninety-seven-count indictment against the company, for covering up the discharge of ninety-one tons of benzene, a carcinogen, from its refinery in Corpus Christi, Texas. The company was liable for three hundred and fifty million dollars in fines, and four Koch employees faced up to thirty-five years in prison. The Koch Petroleum Group eventually pleaded guilty to one criminal charge of covering up environmental violations, including the falsification of documents, and paid a twenty-million-dollar fine. David Uhlmann, a career prosecutor who, at the time, headed the environmental-crimes section at the Justice Department, described the suit as "one of the most significant cases ever brought under the Clean Air Act." He added, "Environmental crimes are almost always motivated by economics and arrogance, and in the Koch case there was a healthy dose of both."

During the 2000 election campaign, Koch Industries spent some nine hundred thousand dollars to support the candidacies of George W. Bush and other Republicans. During the Bush years, Koch Industries and other fossil-fuel companies enjoyed remarkable prosperity. The 2005 energy bill, which Hillary Clinton dubbed the Dick Cheney Lobbyist Energy Bill, offered enormous subsidies and tax breaks for energy companies. The Kochs have cast themselves as deficit hawks, but, according to a study by Media Matters, their companies have benefitted from nearly a hundred million dollars in government contracts since 2000.

In 2004, Citizens for a Sound Economy was accused of illegitimately throwing its weight behind Bush's reëlection. The group's Oregon branch had attempted to get Ralph Nader on the Presidential ballot, in order to dilute Democratic support for John Kerry. Critics argued that it was illegal for a tax-exempt nonprofit organization to donate its services for partisan political purposes. (A complaint was filed with the Federal Election Commission; it was dismissed.)

That year, internal rivalries at Citizens for a Sound Economy caused the organization to split apart. David Koch and Fink started a new group, Americans for Prosperity, and they hired Tim Phillips to run it. Phillips was a political veteran who had worked with Ralph Reed, the evangelical leader and Republican activist, co-founding Century Strategies, a campaign-consulting company that became notorious for its ties to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Phillips's online biography describes him as an expert in "grasstops" and "grassroots" political organizing. The Kochs' choice of Phillips signalled an even greater toughness. The conservative operative Grover Norquist, who is known for praising "throat slitters" in politics, called Phillips "a grownup who can make things happen."

Last year, Phillips told the Financial Times that Americans for Prosperity had only eight thousand registered members. Currently, its Web site claims that the group has "1.2 million activists." Whatever its size, the Kochs' political involvement has been intense; a former employee of the Cato Institute told me that Americans for Prosperity "was micromanaged by the Kochs." And the brothers' investment may well have paid off: Americans for Prosperity, in concert with the family's other organizations, has been instrumental in disrupting the Obama Presidency.

In January, 2008, Charles Koch wrote in his company newsletter that America could be on the verge of "the greatest loss of liberty and prosperity since the 1930s." That October, Americans for Prosperity held a conference of conservative operatives at a Marriott hotel outside Washington. Erick Erickson, the editor-in-chief of the conservative blog RedState.com, took the lectern, thanked David Koch, and vowed to "unite and fight . . . the armies of the left!" Soon after Obama assumed office, Americans for Prosperity launched "Porkulus" rallies against Obama's stimulus-spending measures. Then the Mercatus Center released a report claiming that stimulus funds had been directed disproportionately toward Democratic districts; eventually, the author was forced to correct the report, but not before Rush Limbaugh, citing the paper, had labelled Obama's program "a slush fund," and Fox News and other conservative outlets had echoed the sentiment. (Phil Kerpen, the vice-president for policy at Americans for Prosperity, is a contributor to the Fox News Web site. Another officer at Americans for Prosperity, Walter Williams, often guest-hosts for Limbaugh.)

Americans for Prosperity also created an offshoot, Patients United Now, which organized what Phillips has estimated to be more than three hundred rallies against health-care reform. At one rally, an effigy of a Democratic congressman was hung; at another, protesters unfurled a banner depicting corpses from Dachau. The group also helped organize the "Kill the Bill" protests outside the Capitol, in March, where Democratic supporters of health-care reform alleged that they were spat on and cursed at. Phillips was a featured speaker.

Americans for Prosperity has held at least eighty events targeting cap-and-trade legislation, which is aimed at making industries pay for the air pollution that they create. Speakers for the group claimed, with exaggeration, that even back-yard barbecues and kitchen stoves would be taxed. The group was also involved in the attacks on Obama's "green jobs" czar, Van Jones, and waged a crusade against international climate talks. Casting his group as a champion of ordinary workers who would be hurt by environmentalists, Phillips went to Copenhagen last year and staged a protest outside the United Nations conference on climate change, declaring, "We're a grassroots organization. . . . I think it's unfortunate when wealthy children of wealthy families . . . want to send unemployment rates in the United States up to twenty per cent."

Grover Norquist, who holds a weekly meeting for conservative leaders in Washington, including representatives from Americans for Prosperity, told me that last summer's raucous rallies were pivotal in undermining Obama's agenda. The Republican leadership in Congress, he said, "couldn't have done it without August, when people went out on the streets. It discouraged deal-makers"—Republicans who might otherwise have worked constructively with Obama. Moreover, the appearance of growing public opposition to Obama affected corporate donors on K Street. "K Street is a three-billion-dollar weathervane," Norquist said. "When Obama was strong, the Chamber of Commerce said, 'We can work with the Obama Administration.' But that changed when thousands of people went into the street and 'terrorized' congressmen. August is what changed it. Now that Obama is weak, people are getting tough."

As the first anniversary of Obama's election approached, David Koch came to the Washington area to attend a triumphant Americans for Prosperity gathering. Obama's poll numbers were falling fast. Not a single Republican senator was working with the Administration on health care, or much else. Pundits were writing about Obama's political ineptitude, and Tea Party groups were accusing the President of initiating "a government takeover." In a speech, Koch said, "Days like today bring to reality the vision of our board of directors when we started this organization, five years ago." He went on, "We envisioned a mass movement, a state-based one, but national in scope, of hundreds of thousands of American citizens from all walks of life standing up and fighting for the economic freedoms that made our nation the most prosperous society in history. . . . Thankfully, the stirrings from California to Virginia, and from Texas to Michigan, show that more and more of our fellow-citizens are beginning to see the same truths as we do."

While Koch didn't explicitly embrace the Tea Party movement that day, more recently he has come close to doing so, praising it for demonstrating the "powerful visceral hostility in the body politic against the massive increase in government power, the massive efforts to socialize this country." Charles Koch, in a newsletter sent to his seventy thousand employees, compared the Obama Administration to the regime of the Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez. The Kochs' sense of imperilment is somewhat puzzling. Income inequality in America is greater than it has been since the nineteen-twenties, and since the seventies the tax rates of the wealthiest have fallen more than those of the middle class. Yet the brothers' message has evidently resonated with voters: a recent poll found that fifty-five per cent of Americans agreed that Obama is a socialist.

Americans for Prosperity, meanwhile, has announced that it will spend an additional forty-five million dollars before the midterm elections, in November. Although the group is legally prohibited from directly endorsing candidates, it nonetheless plans to target some fifty House races and half a dozen Senate races, staging rallies, organizing door-to-door canvassing, and running ads aimed at "educating voters about where candidates stand."

Though the Kochs have slowed Obama's momentum, their larger political battle is far from won. Richard Fink, interviewed by FrumForum.com this spring, said, "If you look at where we've gone from the year 2000 to now, with the expansion of government spending and a debt burden that threatens to bankrupt the country, it doesn't look very good at all." He went on, "It looks like the infrastructure that was built and nurtured has not carried the day." He suggested that the Kochs needed "to get more into the practical, day-to-day issues of governing."

n 1991, David Koch was badly injured in a plane crash in Los Angeles. He was the sole passenger in first class to survive. As he was recovering, a routine physical exam led to the discovery of prostate cancer. Koch received treatment, settled down, started a family, and reconsidered his life. As he told Portfolio, "When you're the only one who survived in the front of the plane and everyone else died—yeah, you think, 'My God, the good Lord spared me for some greater purpose.' My joke is that I've been busy ever since, doing all the good work I can think of, so He can have confidence in me."

Koch began giving spectacularly large donations to the arts and sciences. And he became a patron of cancer research, focussing on prostate cancer. In addition to his gifts to Sloan-Kettering, he gave fifteen million dollars to New York-Presbyterian Hospital, a hundred and twenty-five million to M.I.T. for cancer research, twenty million to Johns Hopkins University, and twenty-five million to the M. D. Anderson Cancer Center, in Houston. In response to his generosity, Sloan-Kettering gave Koch its Excellence in Corporate Leadership Award. In 2004, President Bush named him to the National Cancer Advisory Board, which guides the National Cancer Institute.

Koch's corporate and political roles, however, may pose conflicts of interest. For example, at the same time that David Koch has been casting himself as a champion in the fight against cancer, Koch Industries has been lobbying to prevent the E.P.A. from classifying formaldehyde, which the company produces in great quantities, as a "known carcinogen" in humans.

Scientists have long known that formaldehyde causes cancer in rats, and several major scientific studies have concluded that formaldehyde causes cancer in human beings—including one published last year by the National Cancer Institute, on whose advisory board Koch sits. The study tracked twenty-five thousand patients for an average of forty years; subjects exposed to higher amounts of formaldehyde had significantly higher rates of leukemia. These results helped lead an expert panel within the National Institutes of Health to conclude that formaldehyde should be categorized as a known carcinogen, and be strictly controlled by the government. Corporations have resisted regulations on formaldehyde for decades, however, and Koch Industries has been a large funder of members of Congress who have stymied the E.P.A., requiring it to defer new regulations until more studies are completed.

Koch Industries became a major producer of the chemical in 2005, after it bought Georgia-Pacific, the paper and wood-products company, for twenty-one billion dollars. Georgia-Pacific manufactures formaldehyde in its chemical division, and uses it to produce various wood products, such as plywood and laminates. Its annual production capacity for formaldehyde is 2.2 billion pounds. Last December, Traylor Champion, Georgia-Pacific's vice-president of environmental affairs, sent a formal letter of protest to federal health authorities. He wrote that the company "strongly disagrees" with the N.I.H. panel's conclusion that formaldehyde should be treated as a known human carcinogen. David Koch did not recuse himself from the National Cancer Advisory Board, or divest himself of company stock, while his company was directly lobbying the government to keep formaldehyde on the market. (A board spokesperson said that the issue of formaldehyde had not come up.)

James Huff, an associate director at the National Institute for Environmental Health Sciences, a division of the N.I.H., told me that it was "disgusting" for Koch to be serving on the National Cancer Advisory Board: "It's just not good for public health.

Vested interests should not be on the board." He went on, "Those boards are very important. They're very influential as to whether N.C.I. goes into formaldehyde or not. Billions of dollars are involved in formaldehyde."

Harold Varmus, the director of the National Cancer Institute, knows David Koch from Memorial Sloan-Kettering, which he used to run. He said that, at Sloan-Kettering, "a lot of people who gave to us had large business interests. The one thing we wouldn't tolerate in our board members is tobacco." When told of Koch Industries' stance on formaldehyde, Varmus said that he was "surprised."

he David H. Koch Hall of Human Origins, at the Smithsonian's National Museum of Natural History, is a multimedia exploration of the theory that mankind evolved in response to climate change. At the main entrance, viewers are confronted with a giant graph charting the Earth's temperature over the past ten million years, which notes that it is far cooler now than it was ten thousand years ago. Overhead, the text reads, "HUMANS EVOLVED IN RESPONSE TO A CHANGING WORLD." The message, as amplified by the exhibit's Web site, is that "key human adaptations evolved in response to environmental instability." Only at the end of the exhibit, under the headline "OUR SURVIVAL CHALLENGE," is it noted that levels of carbon dioxide are higher now than they have ever been, and that they are projected to increase dramatically in the next century. No cause is given for this development; no mention is made of any possible role played by fossil fuels. The exhibit makes it seem part of a natural continuum. The accompanying text says, "During the period in which humans evolved, Earth's temperature and the amount of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere fluctuated together." An interactive game in the exhibit suggests that humans will continue to adapt to climate change in the future. People may build "underground cities," developing "short, compact bodies" or "curved spines," so that "moving around in tight spaces will be no problem."

Such ideas uncannily echo the Koch message. The company's January newsletter to employees, for instance, argues that "fluctuations in the earth's climate predate humanity," and concludes, "Since we can't control Mother Nature, let's figure out how to get along with her changes." Joseph Romm, a physicist who runs the Web site ClimateProgress.org, is infuriated by the Smithsonian's presentation. "The whole exhibit whitewashes the modern climate issue," he said. "I think the Kochs wanted to be seen as some sort of high-minded company, associated with the greatest natural-history and science museum in the country. But the truth is, the exhibit is underwritten by big-time polluters, who are underground funders of action to stop efforts to deal with this threat to humanity. I think the Smithsonian should have drawn the line."

Cristián Samper, the museum's director, said that the exhibit is not about climate change, and described Koch as "one of the best donors we've had, in my tenure here, because he's very interested in the content, but completely hands off." He noted, "I don't know all the details of his involvement in other issues."

The Kochs have long depended on the public's not knowing all the details about them. They have been content to operate what David Koch has called "the largest company that you've never heard of." But with the growing prominence of the Tea Party, and with increased awareness of the Kochs' ties to the movement, the brothers may find it harder to deflect scrutiny. Recently, President Obama took aim at the Kochs' political network. Speaking at a Democratic National Committee fund-raiser, in Austin, he warned supporters that the Supreme Court's recent ruling in the Citizens United case—which struck down laws prohibiting direct corporate spending on campaigns—had made it even easier for big companies to hide behind "groups with harmless-sounding names like Americans for Prosperity." Obama said, "They don't have to say who, exactly, Americans for Prosperity are. You don't know if it's a foreign-controlled corporation"—or even, he added, "a big oil company." ♦

Not a day goes by that I am not thankful for the chance you've given to me to work on issues that mean so much to me. I am so proud to work for you.

But never was this more so than this week, when amid everything else, you stood up courageously for principle on 686. Our voice did not prevail, but it was heard, and everyone in my office who worked on this was so very proud that we have a great leader of conscience as our Secretary.

Happy Thanksgiving to your whole family.

Subject: Happy Thanksgiving!

Hope you are having a (relatively) quiet day with the family.

I'm taking a break from peeling potatoes to report the following:

I've circulated a call sheet for your conversation with Bibi to the group and asked them to look at it tomorrow morning (no need to make them do it today) so that we can have a consensus recommendation for how you should approach the call. The idea would be to send you the call sheet around noon tomorrow in time for an afternoon call, if you have the time.

WASHINGTON (Reuters) – The United States has briefed its allies Britain, Australia, Canada, Denmark and Norway ahead of the expected new release of classified U.S. documents, WikiLeaks said November 25, citing local press reports. The whistle-blowing website said by Twitter that American diplomats briefed government officials in the five nations in advance of the release expected in the next few days.

SEOUL (Reuters) - DPRK said November 26 the South and the United States were pushing the peninsula to "the brink of war" with their plan to conduct large-scale military drills, days after the rival Koreas exchanged artillery fire. "The situation on the Korean Peninsula is inching closer to the brink of war due to the reckless plan of those trigger-happy elements to stage again war exercises targeted against the (DPRK)," DPRK's official KCNA news agency said.

Subject: (AP) Lebanese PM seeks support in Iran visit

TEHRAN (AP) - Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri expressed concerns for stability in the Middle East as he began a visit to Tehran November 27 to rally Iran's support for his efforts to keep Lebanon stable amid tensions over a UN probe into the assassination of his father, Rafik Hariri.

The visit follows President Ahmadinejad's October tour of Lebanon, during which the Iranian leader reinforced Tehran's ties to the Lebanese militant Hezbollah group, a longtime protege of the Shiite powerhouse.

The exuberant welcome the Shiite Hezbollah staged for Ahmadinejad in Lebanon threw Hariri's Western-backed factions in the government on the defensive.

After touchdown in Tehran, Hariri was greeted by Iran's Vice President Mohammad Reza Rahimi and reviewed an honor guard before heading in to meetings.

November 27, 2010
By JACK HEALY

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, seeking to show that he is in control of a tenuous new ruling coalition, said Saturday that he would push ahead to form a new government with or without potential allies, and that there was no need for American troops to remain in Iraq past a December 2011 deadline for withdrawal.

In his first news conference since being formally nominated as prime minister two days ago, Mr. Maliki acknowledged the growing frustration of Iraqis, who have watched their leaders collect salaries of up to $11,000 a month and fly off to their second homes while in much of the country's electricity remains sporadic and violent attacks continue.

Mr. Maliki's remarks also reflected the splinters that remained inside Iraq's nascent partnership government, and the competing interests of political groups that have coalesced behind him.
There is no need for American troops to remain in Iraq beyond December 2011, Mr. Maliki said, apparently in a nod to the followers of the anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who have promised to fight any attempt to maintain an American military presence here.

The Sadrists have played a critical role in supporting Mr. Maliki for a second term after indecisive elections in March. Some American and Iraqi officials have argued that a residual force is necessary to continue training Iraqi soldiers and help maintain military equipment, but on Saturday, Mr. Maliki said the Iraqis could stand alone.

"I don't see a need for any other international forces to help Iraqis control the security situation," he said.

Iraqi officials announced Saturday that they had arrested 12 people who orchestrated a bloody siege against a Christian church here last month. They called the arrests evidence of improvements in the country's security forces.

Interior Ministry officials said the insurgents had ties to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, and had also planned to also blow up the main gates of the International Zone, where the United States Embassy is located. Officials said they had seized 6 suicide belts, 10 improvised explosive devices and 5 tons of bomb-making material as a result of the arrests.

At his news conference, Mr. Maliki, a religious Shiite, said he wanted the new government to include his main rival, Ayad Allawi, whose Iraqiya coalition won the most support among Iraq's Sunni minority. But Mr. Maliki indicated he would move forward with or without Mr. Allawi, who has sharply criticized the power-sharing deal.

"If we reach the critical area and we have to announce the government, we will go on with who is beside us, who wants to be a partner," Mr. Maliki said.

Mr. Allawi, a secular Shiite and former Iraqi prime minister, has been offered a position leading a new strategic policy council, but has not said whether he will accept the job.

For Mr. Maliki, the clock is ticking. He now has four weeks to cobble together a government that satisfies most demands of the country's ethnic, religious and political factions.

He said he had sent letters asking the different coalitions for nominations for key government offices, and would announce his ministers by Dec. 10 or 15.

RELEASE IN FULL

November 27, 2010

Via Electronic Mail
Ms. Jennifer Robinson
Attorney for Mr. Julian Assange
WikiLeaks
179 Great Portland Street
London WIW 5LS

Dear Ms. Robinson and Mr. Assange:

I am writing in response to your 26 November 2010 letter to U.S. Ambassador Louis B. Sussman regarding your intention to again publish on your WikiLeaks site reportedly up to 250,000 classified U.S. Government documents which are not authorized for release.

As you know, if the materials you intend to publish were provided by any government officials, or any intermediary without proper authorization, they were provided in violation of U.S. law and without regard for the grave consequences of this action. As long as WikiLeaks holds this material, the violation of the law is ongoing.

It is our understanding from conversations with representatives from The New York Times, The Guardian and Der Speigel, that WikiLeaks also has provided approximately 250,000 documents to them for publication, furthering the illegal dissemination of classified documents.

Publication of documents of this nature at a minimum would:

- Place at risk the lives of countless innocent individuals – from journalists to human rights activists and bloggers to soldiers to individuals providing information to further peace and security;

- Place at risk on-going military operations, including operations to stop terrorists, traffickers in human beings and illicit arms, violent criminal enterprises and other actors that threaten global security; and,

- Place at risk on-going cooperation between countries – partners, allies and common stakeholders – to confront common challenges from terrorism to pandemic diseases to nuclear proliferation that threaten global stability.

In your letter, you say you want – consistent with your goal of "maximum disclosure" – information regarding individuals who may be "at significant risk of harm" because of your actions.

Despite your stated desire to protect those lives, you have done the opposite and endangered the lives of countless individuals. You have undermined your stated objective by disseminating this material widely, without redaction and without regard to the security and sanctity of the lives your actions endanger. We will not engage in a negotiation regarding the further release or dissemination of illegally obtained U.S. Government classified materials. If you are genuinely interested in seeking to stop the damage from your actions, you should: 1) ensure WikiLeaks ceases publishing any and all such materials; 2) ensure WikiLeaks returns any and all classified U.S. Government material in its possession; and 3) remove and destroy all records of this material from WikiLeaks' databases.

Sincerely,

Harold Hongju Koh
Legal Adviser
U.S. Department of State

This is a rolling challenge that will, unfortunately, go on for weeks of disclosure and defense. So, our prep is crucial but we will have to adjust as it goes. I think your trip to Malaysia is crucial and their desire for English teachers could be filled thru a partnership w the retirees of the AFT and NEA. I'd like to develop that since both of them have $ to help pay for it. We should discuss when you have a chance to assess the situation. Travel safe.

RELEASE IN PART
B6

Trip to North Korea, August 24-27, 2010

On July 21 I was informed that North Korea wanted me and my wife to come to Pyongyang and secure the release of Aijalon Gomes, who had been arrested in January for entering the country illegally. He had been tried and sentenced to eight years of hard labor and fined about US$700,000. Gomes was transferred to a hospital on July 4 and was being given intensive medical care. They made it clear that I was the only one whose request for Gomes's release would be honored, and stated that I would be meeting with Chairman Kim Jong Il and other leaders in hope of resurrecting the U.S.-DPRK agreements on denuclearization and peace that were the last official act of President Kim Il Sung when Rosalynn and I were invited there in June, 1994. Apparently, the N. Koreans attach extraordinary importance to the legacy of their "Great Leader and President for all time."

After reconfirming these proposals with the North Koreans, I notified the White House, but the requested mission was not approved until Mid-August, when we were informed by N. Korea that, because of the delays, Gomes would be transferred from the hospital back to prison. I was told that Kim Jong Il would no longer be available. At that time our trip was approved, with the understanding that I would be acting in a personal and unofficial status, not representing or sponsored by our government, with minimal publicity for the trip. I accepted all these restraints with pleasure. In the meantime, an assessment team was sent from the State Department to ascertain the medical condition of the prisoner and to seek his freedom. Although I did not receive any briefing on U.S. Korean policy, The Carter Center has monitored developments in the region as thoroughly as possible, and I was familiar with most issues.

B6

Rosalynn was unable to make the delayed trip, but I was accompanied by Dr. John Hardman, CEO of The Carter Center, my son Jeffrey, who has made a special study of Korean peninsula issues, my assistant Nancy Konigsmark, and John Moores, who provided the chartered plane that made the trip possible. On August 21, I notified Gomes's mother that we would be bringing her son home to Boston, and would call her from Anchorage, Alaska, to give her a more exact time for our arrival.

With intermediate stops in Alaska and Japan, we then flew directly to Pyongyang. On the way I prepared a hand-written note expressing regret that Mr. Gomes had violated the laws of N. Korea and requesting that he be pardoned for humanitarian reasons.

I was met by Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Kwan, who had participated in my previous negotiations with Kim Il Sung in 1994 and has been the chief negotiator for N. Korea in the 6-power talks. He understood that I had no official status and would never speak on behalf of the U.S. government. We then went to meet with Kim Yong Nam, who is President of the Supreme People's Assembly Presidium and titular head of state - whom I also knew from my earlier visit. He was clearly in charge. After receiving my written request for the pardon of Gomes, President Kim emphasized the seriousness of three recent American violations of N. Korean sovereignty (including two women journalists) and said it would be at least 24 hours before a final decision could be made. In the meantime, he wanted to explore with me the possibilities and procedures that might be followed to honor the final commitments of Kim Il Sung, the subsequent N. Korea-USA framework agreement adopted by the Clinton administration, and to implement fully the comprehensive agreements made in 6-power talks in September 2005. (He referred to the talks as "sentenced to death but not yet executed.")

He and I then spent about four hours in discussion of the key issues, with him giving me a broad outline of N. Korean proposals on how the existing impasse might be resolved. He requested that I meet with Kim Kye Kwan the next morning to go into specifics.

After almost 20 hours of travel and the long discussions, we enjoyed some rest in the lovely guest house, and then continued the next morning our more detailed talks about denuclearization, U.N. sanctions, peace agreements, trade and commerce. After lunch I concluded my discussions, this time with Foreign Minister Pak Ui-chun, and was then permitted to visit Mr. Gomes. There followed an elaborate ceremony, involving top officials from the army, the National Defense Commission (chaired by Kim Jong Il), and the Justice Department. Gomes publicly confessed his crime and read a beautiful letter of apology to the people of North Korea and thanked them for his good treatment. After a brief consultation, the officials gave final approval to his pardon, but said he would have to stay in the hospital until the next morning, at which time he would be delivered to us for his journey home.

That night we attended a remarkable concert by the National Symphony Orchestra, which had played host to the New York Symphony Orchestra during its visit to Pyongyang in 2008. The orchestra leaders and all political officials emphasized the importance of a return visit by their National Symphony to the United States. This seems to be very important to them.

The next morning Dr. Hardman picked up Aijalon Gomes at the hospital and they met us at the airport for our flight home. At the time of our departure, a brief press statement was released from The Carter Center in Atlanta.

From Anchorage, I called Gomes's mother, Mrs. Jackie McCarthy, and she and Aijalon enjoyed a long conversation before we departed for Boston. We were met there by about twenty members of the Gomes family, and there was an emotional reunion. After a photograph of us all together, we returned home to Plains.

Agree. I love the AFT/NEA idea. Have you raised it with them? If they are interested I'd love to explore a global partnership with them since there are a number of countries interested in expanding our programs and the exisiting structures --- peace corp, fulbright, etc just aren't organized to handle something like this.

See you when I get back.

This is a rolling challenge that will, unfortunately, go on for weeks of disclosure and defense. So, our prep is crucial but we will have to adjust as it goes. I think your trip to Malaysia is crucial and their desire for English teachers could be filled thru a partnership w the retirees of the AFT and NEA. I'd like to develop that since both of them have $ to help pay for it. We should discuss when you have a chance to assess the situation. Travel safe.

I have been monitoring the wikipedia situation and working with the R team to try and be as prepared as we can.

I am heading to Indonesia on Monday for the opening of the new American Center and then to Malaysia where, among other things, I plan to work with Paul Jones on the English language initiative.

I will be traveling all day Monday so unfortunately out of touch for about 18 hours. I will be in contact with my office as soon as I land and can always cut the trip short if necessary, although, under the circumstances I think it is important to keep to our schedules.

As we have discussed, one of the main drivers of our PD strategy is to ensure we have strong relations in all sectors to help us weather the invitable storms in our relationships and at this point it looks like we have a hurricane on the horizon.

Take care and look forward to seeing you when we both get back.

Just won't stop...

New York, NY -- September 20, 2010 – "NBC Nightly News" anchor and managing editor Brian Williams interviewed President Jimmy Carter to discuss the release of his new book "White House Diary." The interview airs tonight on "NBC Nightly News with Brian Williams."

BRIAN WILLIAMS: The last photo of you with your-- fellow former presidents, you were well off to the side on the right. And I thought to myself, well, there's-- there's a possible metaphor. (LAUGHTER) What is it-- about you, you think, the way you've-- decided to conduct your life and post-presidency? Do you feel listened to? Do you feel-- that you receive your due? Or do you feel, in fact, apart from the crowd?

JIMMY CARTER: No. I-- I feel that my role as a former president is probably superior to that of other presidents. Primarily because of the activism and the-- and the injection of working at the Carter Center and in international affairs, and to some degree, domestic affairs, on energy conservation, on-- on environment, and things of that kind. We're right in the midst of the-- of the constant daily debate.

And-- and-- and the Carter Center has decided, under my leadership, to fill vacuums in the world. When-- when the United States won't deal with troubled areas, we go there and we meet with leaders who can bring an end to a conflict, or an end to a human rights abuse, and so forth. So I-- I feel that have an advantage over many other former presidents in being involved in daily affairs that have shaped the policies of our nation and the world.

WASHINGTON (AP) - A leading Republican lawmaker is rejecting the Obama administration's assertion that ratification of a new arms control treaty with Russia is so pressing that it must be dealt with by the lame-duck Senate. Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona said Sunday that the Senate has much more urgent business to attend to in the weeks before it breaks for Christmas. He said the treaty, known as New START, is extremely complex and can wait until the Senate reconvenes with newly elected members in January. The Obama administration has said ratification is an urgent national security priority. Kyl said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that delaying a vote would reflect the reality of considering a major treaty in three weeks amid important domestic issues.

Here is the link to the video of The Arc. http://friendsofthearc.org/, a national infrastructure trunkline for a future Palestinian State developed by the RAND Corporation. It is only 8 minutes long, but a great overview of the Arc vision and its potential for enabling peace in the region. I promise you it is worth it. It has tested very well with both Palestinians, Israelis and American Jews and Palestinians. It is a genuinely a transformational idea that did not originate from American politicians or diplomats, but rather from innovative American minds in collaboration with stakeholders from all walks of life in Palestine, Israel, the US, Europe, and the Muslim world. And it could be largely financed with private finance.

Ms. Slaughter,

Again, great talk today at the CNAS annual event. Thanks for your time.

As you will remember, I raised the point that we seem not to be engaging regimes or populations regarding affirmative visions of what their societies could achieve in (say) a decade, if only we invested in a certain development strategy.

Clearly, you had once heard about the RAND Corporation's Arc Concept (perhaps from Steve Simon?), for a national infrastructure trunkline for a future Palestinian State. To regain familiarity, please watch the 8 minute video on the home page of www.friendsofthearc.org which provides a great overview of the Arc vision, and its potential for enabling peace in the region. This is an affirmative vision that sells very well to both Palestinians, Israelis and American Jews and Palestinians. I would be happy to prove this. Just imagine if the US came out in support of this vision.

If President Obama simply said something like "The Arc is a great example of a transformational idea which did not originate from American politicians or diplomats, but rather from innovative American minds in collaboration with stakeholders from all walks of life in Palestine, Israel, the US, Europe, and the Muslim world. It's the kind of initiative that I am happy to endorse, and I look forward to better understanding how, through the Arc, America can make a positive contributions to peace, prosperity and security in the region." - some very interesting things would happen. For example, the PIF and other forms of private finance might just finance the whole thing...not requiring any (or at least much) US $.

You don't know me from Adam, but lets just say that I can say with confidence that PM Fayyad backs the Arc as a key part of his two year plan for statehood, and that Abu Mazen's economic advisor (Dr. Mohammad Mustafa - CEO of the PIF) does also. And, that President Peres has been a long time supporter (I have the letter on my computer). I happen to know that Zbigniew Brzezinski will soon be taking a package to NSA Jones on the topic.

Zbig is a huge fan, as are many others from the establishment. If we met for 15 minutes, I could explain the nature of the collective action problem that has prevented many Arc fans from speaking up, and I could explain how I am fixing this problem.

This is a concrete engagement strategy that would not cost the President political capital, but would actually manufacture political capital.

If you are willing to talk for 15-20 minutes, I would be happy to run up to Foggy Bottom to brief you up on the Arc, and where I plan to take it over the next 2 quarters.

Thanks in advance for your interest, and I look forward to getting together.

Sent: Sun Nov 28 11:23:28 2010
Subject: (AP) McCain: Time to discuss `regime change' in DPRK

WASHINGTON (AP) - Sen. John McCain said it was time to discuss "regime change" in DPRK, but the former Navy combat pilot didn't say how he advocates changing the government in the repressive and secretive dictatorship. McCain said he was not suggesting military action against the North. He said the Chinese, the DPRK's closest ally, should rein in its neighbor, and he accused Beijing of failing to play a responsible role in either the Korean peninsula, where tensions are high because of a recent attack by the North, or the world stage. "The key to this, obviously, is China," McCain said on "State of the Union" on CNN. "And, unfortunately, China is not behaving as a responsible world power. It cannot be in China's long-term interest to see a renewed conflict on the Korean peninsula." The Arizona Republican added: "They could bring the North Korean economy to its knees if they wanted to. And I cannot believe that the Chinese should, in a mature fashion, not find it in their interest to restrain North Korea. So far, they are not." McCain said the Chinese government's call for emergency talks was a "fine first step," but he questioned whether DPRK would stop its long history of confrontation without significant penalties. "I think it's time we talked about regime change in North Korea, and I do not mean military action, but I do believe that this is a very unstable regime," McCain said.

WASHINGTON (AP) - The online website WikiLeaks says it will go ahead with the release of hundreds of thousands of classified State Department documents in defiance of U.S. demands not to publish the files. The WikiLeaks website appeared to be inaccessible, and WikiLeaks said in its Twitter feed that it was experiencing a denial of service attack. Nevertheless, WikiLeaks said that publications in the U.S. and Europe would print the leaked diplomatic cables even if it could not. The group's founder, Julian Assange, also tells the U.S. ambassador to Britain that WikiLeaks won't bow to Washington's demands. The Obama administration has been bracing for the release for the past week. Top officials have notified allies that the contents of the diplomatic cables could prove embarrassing because they contain candid assessments of foreign leaders.

The US Diplomatic Leaks

A Superpower's View of the World

By SPIEGEL Staff

251,000 State Department documents, many of them secret embassy reports from around the world, show how the US seeks to safeguard its influence around the world. It is nothing short of a political meltdown for US foreign policy.

What does the United States really think of German Chancellor Angela Merkel? Is she a reliable ally? Did she really make an effort to patch up relations with Washington that had been so damaged by her predecessor? At most, it was a half-hearted one.

The tone of trans-Atlantic relations may have improved, former US Ambassador to Germany William Timken wrote in a cable to the State Department at the end of 2006, but the chancellor "has not taken bold steps yet to improve the substantive content of the relationship." That is not exactly high praise.

And the verdict on German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle? His thoughts "were short on substance," wrote the current US ambassador in Berlin, Philip Murphy, in a cable. The reason, Murphy suggested, was that "Westerwelle's command of complex foreign and security policy issues still requires deepening."

Such comments are hardly friendly. But in the eyes of the American diplomatic corps, every actor is quickly categorized as a friend or foe. King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia? A friend: Abdullah can't stand his neighbors in Iran and, expressing his disdain for the mullah regime, said, "there is no doubt something unstable about them." And his ally, Sheikh bin Zayed of Abu Dhabi? Also a friend. He believes "a near term conventional war with Iran is clearly preferable to the long term consequences of a nuclear armed Iran."

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's emissaries also learn of a special "Iran observer" in the Azerbaijan capital of Baku who reports on a dispute that played out during a meeting of Iran's Supreme National Security Council. An enraged Revolutionary Guard Chief of Staff Mohammed Ali Jafari allegedly got into a heated argument with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and slapped him in the face because the generally conservative president had, surprisingly, advocated freedom of the press.

A Political Meltdown

Such surprises from the annals of US diplomacy will dominate the headlines in the coming days when the New York Times, London's Guardian, Paris' Le Monde, Madrid's El Pais and SPIEGEL begin shedding light on the treasure trove of secret documents from the State Department. Included are 243,270 diplomatic cables filed by US embassies to the State Department and 8,017 directives that the State Department sent to its diplomatic outposts around the world. In the coming days, the participating media will show in a series of investigative stories how America seeks to steer the world. The development is no less than a political meltdown for American foreign policy.

Never before in history has a superpower lost control of such vast amounts of such sensitive information -- data that can help paint a picture of the foundation upon which US foreign policy is built. Never before has the trust America's partners have in the country been as badly shaken. Now, their own personal views and policy recommendations have been made public -- as have America's true views of them.

For example, one can learn that German Defense Minister Karl-Theodor zu Guttenberg, the Germany's most beloved politician according to public opinion polls, openly criticizes fellow cabinet member Guido Westerwelle in conversations with US diplomats, and even snitches on him. Or that Secretary of State Clinton wants her ambassadors in Moscow and Rome to inform her whether there is anything to the rumors that Italian President Silvio Berlusconi and Vladimir Putin have private business ties in addition to their close friendship -- whispers that both have vehemently denied.

America's ambassadors can be merciless in their assessments of the countries in which they are stationed. That's their job. Kenya? A swamp of flourishing corruption extending across the country. Fifteen high-ranking Kenyan officials are already banned from traveling to the United States, and almost every single sentence in the embassy reports speaks with disdain of the government of President Mwai Kibaki and Prime Minister Raila Odinga.

Weighing Public Interest against Confidentiality

Turkey hardly comes away any less scathed in the cables. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, the cables allege, governs with the help of a cabal of incompetent advisors. Ankara Embassy officials depict a country on a path to an Islamist future -- a future that likely won't include European Union membership.

As with the close to 92,000 documents on the war in Afghanistan at the end of July and the almost 400,000 documents on the Iraq war recently released, the State Department cables have also been leaked to the WikiLeaks whistleblower platform -- and they presumably came from the same source. As before, WikiLeaks has provided the material to media partners to review and analyze them.

With a team of more than 50 reporters and researchers, SPIEGEL has viewed, analyzed and vetted the mass of documents. In most cases, the magazine has sought to protect the identities of the Americans' informants, unless the person who served as the informant was senior enough to be politically relevant. In some cases, the US government expressed security concerns and SPIEGEL accepted a number of such objections. In other cases, however, SPIEGEL felt the public interest in reporting the news was greater than the threat to security. Throughout our research, SPIEGEL reporters and editors weighed the public interest against the justified interest of countries in security and confidentiality.

It is now possible to view many political developments around the world through the lens of those who participated in those events. As such, our understanding of those events is deeply enriched. That alone is often enough to place transparency ahead of national regulations regarding confidentiality.

Following the leaks of military secrets from Afghanistan and Iraq, these leaks now put US diplomats on the hot seat. It is the third coup for WikiLeaks within six months, and it is one that is likely to leave Washington feeling more than a bit exposed. Around half of the cables that have been obtained aren't classified and slightly less, 40.5 percent, as classified as "confidential." Six percent of the reports, or 16,652 cables, are labelled as "secret;" and of those, 4,330 are so explosive that they are labelled "NOFORN," meaning access should not be made available to non-US nationals. Taken together, the cables provide enough raw text to fill 66 years worth of weekly SPIEGEL magazines.

Gossip and the Unvarnished Truth

Much in the material was noted and sent because those compiling the reports or their dialogue partners believed, with some certainty, that their transcripts would not be made public for the next 25 years. That may also explain why the ambassadors and emissaries from Washington were so willing to report gossip and hearsay back to State Department headquarters. One cable from the Moscow Embassy on Russian first lady Svetlana Medvedev, for example, states that she is "generating tensions between the camps and remains the subject of avid gossip." It then goes on to report that President Medvedev's wife had already drawn up a list of officials who should be made to "suffer" in their careers because they had been disloyal to Medvedev. Another reports that the wife of Azerbaijan leader Ilham Aliyev has had so much plastic surgery that it is possible to confuse her for one of her daughters from a distance, but that she can barely still move her face.

What makes the documents particularly appealing, though, is that many politicians speak the unvarnished truth, confident as they are that their musings will never be made public.

What, though, do the thousands of documents prove? Do they really show a US which has the world on a leash? Are Washington's embassies still self-contained power centers in their host countries?

In sum, probably not. In the major crisis regions, an image emerges of a superpower that can no longer truly be certain of its allies -- like in Pakistan, where the Americans are consumed by fear that the unstable nuclear power could become precisely the place where terrorists obtain dangerous nuclear material.

There are similar fears in Yemen, where the US, against its better judgement, allows itself to be instrumentalized by an unscrupulous leader. With American military aid that was intended for the fight against al-Qaida, Ali Abdullah Saleh is now able to wage his battle against enemy tribes in the northern part of the country.

Insult to Injury

Even after the fall of Saddam Hussein, it still remained a challenge for the victorious power to assert its will on Iraq. In Baghdad, which has seen a series of powerful US ambassadors -- men the international press often like to refer to as American viceroys -- it is now up to Vice President Joe Biden to make repeated visits to allied Iraqi politicians in an effort to get them to finally establish a respectable democracy. But the embassy cables make it very clear that Obama's deputy has made little headway.

Instead, the Americans are forced to endure the endless tirades of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarek, who claims to have always known that the Iraq war was the "biggest mistake ever committed" and who advised the Americans to "forget about democracy in Iraq." Once the US forces depart, Mubarak said, the best way to ensure a peaceful transition is for there to be a military coup. They are statements that add insult to injury.

On the whole, the cables from the Middle East expose the superpower's weaknesses. Washington has always viewed it as vital to its survival to secure its share of energy reserves, but the world power is often quickly reduced to becoming a plaything of diverse interests. And it is drawn into the animosities between Arabs and Israelis, Shiites and Sunnis, between Islamists and secularists, between despots and kings. Often enough, the lesson of the documents that have now been obtained, is that the Arab leaders use their friends in Washington to expand their own positions of power.

Editor's note: DER SPIEGEL's full reporting on the WikiLeaks US diplomatic cables will be published first in the German-language edition of the magazine, which will be available on Monday to subscribers and at newsstands in Germany and Europe. SPIEGEL ONLINE International will publish extended excerpts of SPIEGEL's reporting in English in a series that will launch on Monday.

The United States was catapulted into a worldwide diplomatic crisis today, with the leaking to the Guardian and other international media of more than 250,000 classified cables from its embassies, many sent as recently as February this year.

At the start of a series of daily extracts from the US embassy cables - many of which are designated "secret" – the Guardian can disclose that Arab leaders are privately urging an air strike on Iran and that US officials have been instructed to spy on the UN's leadership.

These two revelations alone would be likely to reverberate around the world. But the secret dispatches which were obtained by WikiLeaks, the whistlebowers' website, also reveal Washington's evaluation of many other highly sensitive international issues.

These include a major shift in relations between China and North Korea, Pakistan's growing instability and details of clandestine US efforts to combat al-Qaida in Yemen.

Among scores of other disclosures that are likely to cause uproar, the cables detail:

• Grave fears in Washington and London over the security of Pakistan's nuclear weapons programme

• Alleged links between the Russian government and organised crime.

• Devastating criticism of the UK's military operations in Afghanistan.

• Claims of inappropriate behaviour by a member of the British royal family.

The US has particularly intimate dealings with Britain, and some of the dispatches from the London embassy in Grosvenor Square will make uncomfortable reading in Whitehall and Westminster. They range from serious political criticisms of David Cameron to requests for specific intelligence about individual MPs.

The cache of cables contains specific allegations of corruption and against foreign leaders, as well as harsh criticism by US embassy staff of their host governments, from tiny islands in the Caribbean to China and Russia.

The material includes a reference to Vladimir Putin as an "alpha-dog", Hamid Karzai as being "driven by paranoia" and Angela Merkel allegedly "avoids risk and is rarely creative". There is also a comparison between Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Adolf Hitler.

The cables name countries involved in financing terror groups, and describe a near "environmental disaster" last year over a rogue shipment of enriched uranium. They disclose technical details of secret US-Russian nuclear missile negotiations in Geneva, and include a profile of Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi, who they say is accompanied everywhere by a "voluptuous blonde" Ukrainian nurse.

The cables cover secretary of state Hillary Clinton's activities under the Obama administration, as well as thousands of files from the George Bush presidency. Clinton personally led frantic damage limitation this weekend as Washington prepared foreign governments for the revelations. She contacted leaders in Germany, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf, France and Afghanistan.

US ambassadors in other capitals were instructed to brief their hosts in advance of the release of unflattering pen-portraits or nakedly frank accounts of transactions with the US which they had thought would be kept quiet. Washington now faces a difficult task in convincing contacts around the world that any future conversations will remain confidential.

"We are all bracing for what may be coming and condemn WikiLeaks for the release of classified material," state department spokesman PJ Crowley said. "It will place lives and interests at risk. It is irresponsible."

The state department's legal adviser has written to Wikileaks founder Julian Assange and his London lawyer, warning that the cables were obtained illegally and that publication would place at risk "the lives of countless innocent individuals ... ongoing military operations ... and cooperation between countries".

The electronic archive of embassy dispatches from around the world was allegedly downloaded by a US soldier earlier this year and passed to WikiLeaks. Assange made them available to the Guardian and four other newspapers: the New York Times, Der Spiegel in Germany, Le Monde in France and El País in Spain. All five plan to publish extracts from the most significant cables, but have decided neither to "dump" the entire dataset into the public domain, nor to publish names that would endanger innocent individuals. WikiLeaks says that, contrary to the state department's fears, it also initially intends to post only limited cable extracts, and to redact identities.

The cables published today reveal how the US uses its embassies as part of a global espionage network, with diplomats tasked to obtain not just information from the people they meet, but personal details, such as frequent flyer numbers, credit card details and even DNA material.

Classified "human intelligence directives" issued in the name of Hillary Clinton or her predecessor, Condoleeza Rice, instruct officials to gather information on military installations, weapons markings, vehicle details of political leaders as well as iris scans, fingerprints and DNA.

The most controversial target was the leadership of the United Nations. That directive requested the specification of telecoms and IT systems used by top UN officials and their staff and details of "private VIP networks used for official communication, to include upgrades, security measures, passwords, personal encryption keys".

When the Guardian put this allegation to Crowley, the state department spokesman said: "Let me assure you: our diplomats are just that, diplomats. They do not engage in intelligence activities. They represent our country around the world, maintain open and transparent contact with other governments as well as public and private figures, and report home. That's what diplomats have done for hundreds of years."

The dispatches also shed light on older diplomatic issues. One cable, for example, reveals, that Nelson Mandela was "furious" when a top adviser stopped him meeting Margaret Thatcher shortly after his release from prison to explain why the ANC objected to her policy of "constructive engagement" with the apartheid regime. "We understand Mandela was keen for a Thatcher meeting but that [appointments secretary Zwelakhe] Sisulu argued successfully against it," according to the cable. It continues: "Mandela has on several occasions expressed his eagerness for an early meeting with Thatcher to express the ANC's objections to her policy. We were consequently surprised when the meeting didn't materialise on his mid-April visit to London and suspected that ANC hardliners had nixed Mandela's plans."

The US embassy cables are marked "Sipdis" – secret internet protocol distribution. They were compiled as part of a programme under which selected dispatches, considered moderately secret but suitable for sharing with other agencies, would be automatically loaded on to secure embassy websites, and linked with the military's Siprnet internet system.

They are classified at various levels up to "SECRET NOFORN" [no foreigners]. More than 11,000 are marked secret, while around 9,000 of the cables are marked noforn. The embassies which sent most cables were Ankara, Baghdad, Amman, Kuwait and Tokyo.

More than 3 million US government personnel and soldiers, many extremely junior, are cleared to have potential access to this material, even though the cables contain the identities of foreign informants, often sensitive contacts in dictatorial regimes. Some are marked "protect" or "strictly protect".

Last spring, 22-year-old intelligence analyst Bradley Manning was charged with leaking many of these cables, along with a gun-camera video of an Apache helicopter crew mistakenly killing two Reuters news agency employees in Baghdad in 2007, which was subsequently posted by WikiLeaks. Manning is facing a court martial.

In July and October WikiLeaks also published thousands of leaked military reports from Afghanistan and Iraq. These were made available for analysis beforehand to the Guardian, along with Der Spiegel and the New York Times.

A former hacker, Adrian Lamo, who reported Manning to the US authorities, said the soldier had told him in chat messages that the cables revealed "how the first world exploits the third, in detail".

He also said, according to Lamo, that Clinton "and several thousand diplomats around the world are going to have a heart attack when they wake up one morning and find an entire repository of classified foreign policy is available in searchable format to the public ... everywhere there's a US post ... there's a diplomatic scandal that will be revealed".

Asked why such sensitive material was posted on a network accessible to thousands of government employees, the state department spokesman told the Guardian: "The 9/11 attacks and their aftermath revealed gaps in intra-governmental information sharing. Since the attacks of 9/11, the US government has taken significant steps to facilitate information sharing. These efforts were focused on giving diplomatic, military, law enforcement and intelligence specialists quicker and easier access to more data to more effectively do their jobs."

He added: "We have been taking aggressive action in recent weeks and months to enhance the security of our systems and to prevent the leak of information."

RIYADH (Reuters) - Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah, who is being treated in New York for a blood clot which complicated a slipped disc, has started rehabilitation and his health is "very reassuring", the kingdom's health minister said on November 28. The remarks by Abdullah al-Rabeeah to state television came after the king, who is around 86 or 87, underwent surgery on his back on November 24 which the royal court said was successful. Prince Nayef, Abdullah's half-brother and interior minister, said on Saturday the king had been walking after the operation. Pictures by state media before Abdullah's departure and upon his arrival in New York showed the king sitting in a wheelchair. Abdullah asked Crown Prince Sultan to run the country in his absence. Sultan, thought to be in his mid-eighties, has had unspecified health problems in the past two years. The Gulf Arab state controls more than a fifth of the world's crude reserves, is a vital U.S. ally, a major holder of dollar assets and home to the biggest Arab bourse.

HRC: I am attaching a matrix of prior language that has been used in connection with the major Israeli-Palestinian issues.

It was prepared in the context of language the US might use if it were to articulate principles, not principles to which the parties might agree, but it provides most of the language that has been used in the past, with citations.

The USIP Middle East group Steve and I chair decided that rather than issue a static report, we would prepare/commission a series of timely and specific papers that we would provide privately to the Administration. (I have sent some of those to your office). They include papers on security, Palestinian institution building, public attitudes in Israel and the territories, etc. B6

I will deliver a set of those papers to your office on Monday

If it would be useful, I would be happy to convene a small, private discussion with some of the sharpest people in the group, or give you some names.

A few observations following up our call this am.:

(1) This (a Framework Agreement) is very difficult but I don't think impossible. If Bibi can say he has secured unprecedented commitments on security and established the principle of a Jewish state, he could decide to play the historic leader. If he is uncompromising, he will have to deal with the consequences for US-Israeli relations. His opt out, of course, is to blame the Pals, but we will be "in the room".
(2) I think this should be a negotiation that goes from principle to paper rather than the other way around, i.e. not an early exchange of documents that dig each side into its positions. The two leaders need to feel each other out first at the level of first principles, to be distilled after a period by the U.S.
(3) Not sure we need to be in every meeting.. Ultimately, they need to establish some trust. But we (you or Mitchell) need to be present enough to make sure that there is no misunderstanding of what has been agreed, and to move things along. .
(4) On the critical issue of security, I don't think the Israelis any more trust NATO to stand firm. They will expect an IDF presence in the Jordan Valley for some time. Palestinians recognize that there will be a transitional phase. Question is how long.
(5) As you know, Abbas' position is crumbling. Based on my conversation with him when he was here recently, I think he is genuinely committed to an agreement. He hopes that, if this fails, Bibi will seem to be unreasonable. And in that event, I expect he will resign. His minimal requirement is the equivalent of 1967.

This is all tricky business, but I don't think we have a responsible choice not to make this effort. It is the highest form of statesmanship for you to try.

I am leaving on Monday for some foreign travel but can be reached through my office -- Laura Huber

Points for FM Davutoglu on Wikileaks

. Spiegel Online previews the

Der Spiegel analysis (set for publication tomorrow) that "if one were to believe the gloomy reports from the embassy in Ankara, Turkey is on a slippery slope to volatile Islamism, spurred on by the narrow-minded government of Prime Minister Recept Tayyip Erdogan, who is portrayed as being reliant on a group of incompetent advisors."

Here is the latest draft, which incorporates your changes and suggestions, and has been through each of us (me, Jake, and AMS) at least once. There may still be a few facts to be tweaked and we are looking for one more example from WHA for the Mexico paragraph. I will also re-read it carefully later tonight and tomorrow morning to catch any typos, weird grammar, or things that don't flow. I'm too close to it now and want to read it again when I'm fresh. But hopefully this is close to final.

Subject: Update on PSA

Wanted to update you all on the PSA and where things stand. The Ad Council placed the PSA on Wednesday.

Overall, based on the MNR report, our estimated online audience for the PSA launch story was 5.4 million, including stories on Yahoo Finance, Forbes, and CNN. For just over 24 hours since the MNR distribution, this is fantastic pickup per the Ad Council.

The Ad Council will continue to push this out domestically and giving us updates on where it is. They are targeting large sporting events like U.S Open, etc. If you would like the full report with specific stories, I can send separately however because the file is so large I do not want to max out everyone's inboxes.

On the International side and specifically S interest in placing with Al Jazeera, the Ad Council did a slightly modified version of the 30 sec PSA, removing the texting information on the final screen and is overnighting the tape to the State Department today. Once we have that (timing for Tuesday), we will work with Dana and PA to have the PSA placed accordingly where makes sense.

Larry has already said that local stations in Pakistan liked the ad and were using it/reporting on it. As he is obviously very busy, hard to know more beyond this point. IIP has been great and the revised ad is going up on America.gov. Will work them to see what other embassy sites, etc we can promote this with.

We will continue to work to place the ad and will have donation reports on Tuesday that hopefully will reflect monetary upticks as well. Let me know if you have any questions. Best, Katie Below please find statements from Kerry, Ros-Lehtinen, Hoekstra, and King.

Haven't seen anything yet from Lugar or Berman.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John Kerry:

"The release of classified information under these circumstances is a reckless action which jeopardizes lives by exposing raw, contemporaneous intelligence. This is not an academic exercise about freedom of information and it is not akin to the release of the Pentagon Papers, which involved an analysis aimed at saving American lives and exposing government deception. Instead, these sensitive cables contain candid assessments and analysis of ongoing matters and they should remain confidential to protect the ability of the government to conduct lawful business with the private candor that's vital to effective diplomacy."

Ros-Lehtinen Condemns Latest Wikileaks Release of Sensitive U.S. Documents

(WASHINGTON) – U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, commented today on the release of scores of sensitive documents by the Wikileaks website. Statement by Ros-Lehtinen:

> "This latest release of classified and other sensitive U.S. documents by Wikileaks is extremely irresponsible. Those who leak and publish such information are doing great harm to our nation, and are potentially putting American lives in danger.
> "This newest batch of documents appears to contain troves of classified reports related to our nation's conduct of diplomacy and foreign policy, including reports of critical discussions with our allies. This is the everyday work-product of our officials all over the globe. This critical and highly sensitive information must be managed carefully.
> "It is deeply disturbing that a few individuals seem to have deemed themselves worthy of deciding that scores of classified and sensitive material should be paraded about for our enemies to review and use against us. These leaks come at the expense of U.S. security and, potentially, American lives."

From Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R., Mich.) ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee:

"Wikileaks clearly is determined to undermine U.S. national security and damage our foreign relations. The disclosure of thousands of potentially classified cables and other documents is an embarrassment to the Obama administration and represents a critical failure by the Pentagon and intelligence community to protect sensitive national security information.

"Once again our partners and allies are forced to question whether the United States can keep secrets, and our diplomats around the world have been forced to scramble to try and patch-up foreign relations strained by this illegal leak. ODNI's national counterintelligence executive must move quickly to assess the failures in this case and to establish security protocols, including robust audit capabilities for classified networks. Congress also should move quickly to hold hearings to ensure ODNI, the military and FBI have the necessary counterintelligence authorities to ensure a destructive leak of this nature cannot happen again.
